CONGRESSIONAL RECORD,

SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 28, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the fairest vision that we have gained in life is that which has brought Thee to a personal relation to Thy creatures. We have seen Thy handiwork in the sky above us and Thy great glory in all the work of creation. But our supreme vision is when we look into the face of God as our Father and know that Thou dost reveal Thyself unto us. We pray that this day the light of this vision may guide us in the discharge of the duties that are before us, for Thou in Thyself hast opened to us the portals of the temple of truth. So do Thou lead us on. Grant that Thy grace, ministered through those that know Thee, may push back the boundaries of ignorance and lift the burdens that are unbearable in life, and bring in the reign of God's love and peace among men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

RATES ON SUGAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 26th instant, a copy of the transcript of testimony taken before the Interstate Commerce Commission in the matter of the application of R. H. Countiss, agent, in behalf of transcontinental carriers, for relief from certain provisions with respect to rates on sugar from points in California and other States to Chicago, which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13679) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and had appointed Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, and Mr. HAUGEN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House further insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the further conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUCKER, Mr. BROUSSARD, and Mr. AINEY managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the board of directors of the Boston Chamber of Commerce—

(1) What the country needs at the present time is a rest from new legislation affecting business and an opportunity to adjust itself to the new conditions created by recent Federal legislation, such as the income tax, the revision of the tariff, and the currency law.

(2) There is not sufficient time during the present session of Congress to consider, with the deliberation to which it is entitled, the matter of so-called trust regulation or any general legislation contemplating changes in or additions to the present restrictions on interstate or foreign trade.

(3) Accordingly the board of directors is opposed to the consideration or enactment of any form of such legislation during the present session of Congress.

(4) The whole subject of such legislation should be postponed until the next session of Congress, and in the meantime Congress, by its committee, should take the opportunity to invite the cooperation of business men throughout the country in framing needful legislation.

IMPORTS AND EXPORTS.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask leave of the Senate to occupy a few moments of time. I desire to call attention to some remarks made a few days since by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and to make some remarks of my own by way of a response, and this I shall do for the especial benefit of the Senator from Utah.

On the 20th of the present month the Senator from Utah took an inopportune occasion to make a tariff speech, basing his remarks on a Government report showing imports and exports for the month of April last. I did not hear the Senator's speech, not being present at the time. I read his remarks, however, in the RECORD the following day, always being interested in his fulminations. They will be found on pages 8874 and 8875 of the RECORD.

After reading this address by the Senator——

Mr. SMOOT. Not an address, a statement.

Mr. STONE. Well, after reading the statement of the Senator from Utah, and not having immediate facilities at hand nor time at my disposal to examine into the accuracy of the Senator's compilations and assertions, I wrote a note to the Secretary of Commerce, who has ready and abundant facilities for examining into statistical data, and asked him to examine the statement of the Senator and furnish me with information with respect to the matter covered by the Senator's speech, with any comparative data that might be pertinent as bearing on the Senator's assertions and deductions. In reply I have a letter from the Secretary, which I think it would not be inappropriate to read. If it is considered objectionable to read a communication of this character from a Cabinet officer criticizing a Senator's statement made in debate, I will not read it, but merely use the information conveyed in the communication.

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly have no objection, because every figure that I quoted to the Senate in that statement is quoted from the Department of Commerce. I shall be pleased indeed if the Senator will have the letter read, and then I will ask that the report of the Department of Commerce be put in the RECORD.

Mr. STONE. I did not ask particularly whether it would be pleasing or displeasing to the Senator from Utah, but whether it would be proper as a senatorial proceeding to read the letter. If no one objects, I will read it. It is dated May 25, 1914. The Secretary of Commerce says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have, thanks to your kind favor of the 22d, read with some interest, not unmixed with amusement—

I hope it is not offensive to the Senator from Utah that the Secretary should be amused.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in the least.

Mr. STONE (reading)—

not unmixed with amusement, the outputting of Senator SMOOT as reported in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for May 20, 1914, page 8874, to which you kindly call my attention.

My first suggestion is that to select any single month as indicating anything special is so absurd a proceeding as to need no reply. Pretty much anything could be shown by such a course as that. Such a statement taken by itself alone amounts to nothing at all.

Senator SMOOT dwells upon "a loss in exports"—

The Secretary is quoting from the Senator now—

"a loss in exports of $37,434,586 in a single month."

This was the month of April.

We do not know fully yet what the exports were that thus fell off. We do, however, know that $19,000,000 of them, more than half, were in exports of raw cotton, cottonseed oil, and foodstuffs, including meat. These are not related to the tariff at all. Nor do we know yet in what lines of goods the increased imports from April are. Nothing can be suggested as to tariff effects from these April figures till the facts are known, which is not yet the case.

It is amusing, however, and instructive, in view of the outbreak you bring to my attention, to call to your notice the following words of Senator SMOOT—

Now, the Secretary again quotes from the Senator—

"The imports exceeded exports in April by $10,271,872. Thus we are coming to a condition which has existed under former Democratic tariff laws, when distress everywhere prevailed."

That is what the Senator said. Undoubtedly the main purpose the Senator had in rising on that occasion was to make the observation which appears in the closing paragraph I have just quoted, with several others of like kind.

The Secretary proceeds to say:

Looking back to the last time—

That is, the last time before April—

Looking back to the last time when the imports—

I want the attention of the Senator from Utah when he is through with the conversation he is holding, for I am reading this especially for his benefit. I want to rub this on his sore spots with cayenne ointment, hoping that in spite of the pain it may have some good effect on the intellectual and moral obtuseness he displays whenever he undertakes to discuss the tariff.

I read again:

Looking back to the last time when imports exceeded exports, we discover that it was while the Payne-Aldrich—

I am not content with that designation; I prefer to name it the Payne-Aldrich-Smoot law, for that much is due the Senator from Utah—the Payne-Aldrich law was in effect that this event took place. The trade balance in our favor during the 10 months ending with April, 1910—the trade balance in our favor during the 10 months ending with April, 1910, was $170,931,416, or over $300,000,000 less than during the 10 months ending with the present April.

Let the full force of that be understood. During the first 10 months of the operation of the tariff law which bears the names of Smoot, Aldrich, and Payne the balance of trade in our favor was $300,000,000 less than it was during the 10 months ending with April, 1914—the April which looks so dark to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. JAMES. That was under the existing law.

Mr. STONE. Yes; as my friend from Kentucky says, "that was under the existing law." It was under the Underwood-Simmons law that this larger trade balance occurred—this Democratic law which the Senator from Utah strives so hard but vainly to discredit.

I proceed with the Secretary's letter:

Not only so, but during the first year of the Payne-Aldrich tariff law—

five months showed the imports in excess of the exports, and one of these months, namely, March, 1910, showed an excess of imports of $19,341,578.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Now, wait a moment. I want this to sink in deep on the Senator's consciousness:

And one of these months—

namely, March, 1910, showed an excess of imports of $19,341,578—

Or nearly twice as much as the shortage, so called, occurring in the month of April, 1914, about which the Senator uttered such tearful, albeit vociferous, lamentations.

Mr. SMOOT. Not half as much, instead of twice as much.

Mr. STONE. Here is what the Senator said:

The imports exceeded exports in April by $10,271,872.

That is what the Senator said. I am reading from his own speech. The Senator may not be correct in his statement; that is a possibility always when he is discussing the tariff. When he is talking about post offices and other things he gets nearer to dependable facts.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe the Senator wants to be correct in his statements.

Mr. STONE. The Senator can have his chance; but I want to rub this on now. I want the Senator to be still while I apply this remedy to his disease.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator wanted to state the facts regarding a statement which I have made.

Mr. STONE. I do. I have read absolutely word for word what appears in the Senator's speech.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read it afterwards, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Well, read it afterwards. The Secretary further says:

Any statement as to the effects of a tariff based upon figures for six or eight months is necessarily illusive.

The Secretary does not seek to take advantage of what the figures show for five months of the first year of the Smoot bill. He says such figures are more or less illusive and unreliable as a basis for sound calculation, and the Senator from Utah knows that, too, though he did not say it the other day. He would have said it if he had been back to 1910 and talking about the excess of imports over exports during five months of that year, but he happened to be talking about this Democratic bill, and that was a horse of another color. Hence he did not remember last week that the exports and imports for one month were not a sound basis upon which to make an argument as to the continuing effects of a tariff measure. It did not suit his purpose to remember it at that time.

Any statement as to the effects of a tariff based upon figures for six or eight months—

Says the Secretary—

is necessarily illusive, but if the present tariff is to be judged that way and condemned because of the excess of imports in one month since its passage, what shall be said of the Payne law—

Or, rather, I say, of the Smoot law—

when in a like period after it came into effect there were three months in which the imports exceeded exports, and in one of these that excess was nearly double that about which so much is now said.

I see the Senator is putting on a serious look, and well he might. [Laughter.] I know it hurts. I am applying this caustic, however, with as great tenderness as possible. I really do not mean to be cruel.

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure the Senator is not.

Mr. STONE. But it is necessary sometimes to burn a little. Now, again, the Secretary says:

The criticism made of the present law on the basis of April figures is either good or bad—

That is, it is justified or it is not—

If it is good, then by so much the more is the Payne law—condemned for showing results of the same character, but to a far greater extent.

Is not that so? I am asking the Senator from Utah if that is not so? If you condemn the Underwood law for an excess of imports over exports for one month since it came into effect, and if for the same corresponding period of time after the Smoot law went into effect there were three months of such excess, should you not likewise condemn that law?

The Secretary says:

If the criticism is bad, as I think it is, it falls by its own utterance. You might fairly offset Senator SMOOT'S remarks about "one shipment of tin plate of 12,000 cases landed in the port of New York" by these words from Bradstreet's for May 23, volume 42, No. 1873, page 340:

"The Standard Oil Co. has awarded a contract for 600,000 base boxes, or 30,000 tons, of tin plate to the American Sheet & Tin Plate Co. The order was taken in active competition with Welsh mills."

In the present law we reduced the duty on tin plate from the equivalent ad valorem of about 25 per cent to 15 per cent, and the Senator, by calling attention to the fact that 12,000 cases of tin had come into New York, sought to create the impression and send it broadcast that the tin industry could not compete with foreign mills, and yet here is a statement from a source so authoritative that it will not be questioned that the enormously large contract referred to was given to an American concern in open competition with foreign mills.

Mr. President, I think this communication from the Secretary demolishes absolutely the bad impression, the wrong impression, the remarks of the Senator from Utah were intended to convey to the public.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Is it or is it not a fact that during the six months of the present tariff law 33,000,000 pounds of tin plate have come into this country as against 3,000,000 pounds previously for the same length of time?

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator assert that to be absolutely the fact as to the amounts stated?

Mr. GALLINGER. I assert it as a fact, as it comes to me from what I conceive to be an entirely reliable source.

Mr. STONE. The Senator is not in the habit of making statements that are not very well authenticated, and I am not prepared at this moment to say whether he is correct as to his figures or not. It may be that more came in during the first six months of the present law than came in during the first six months of the Smoot law. Perhaps, as the Senator says, during the last——

Mr. GALLINGER. No; ten times as much—33,000,000 pounds as against 3,000,000 pounds.

Mr. STONE. Possibly ten times as much; but the point I make is that if the American tin-plate manufacturers can successfully compete with foreign mills under present duties, I see no reason why American manufacturers using tin plate, as well as American ultimate consumers, should not have the benefit of this competition and of consequent lower prices. We have argued that question here over and over again, and I do not care to go over it again at this time. My present purpose is simply to put against what the Senator from Utah said the other day—not wishing it to go uncontradicted—the statement which I have read from Secretary Redfield.

And now, for the benefit of the Senator from Utah, also the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and for the other side of the Chamber generally, I want to read a few lines from a letter which I received the other day from a prominent farmer in my State, Mr. B. B. Adams, of Republic, Mo. This letter was written in response to some letters I sent out into the State making inquiry of the people along the lines of industrial conditions in our Commonwealth, since so much is being said here regarding existing conditions. Senators have a habit, some of them, of getting up here from time to time and launching attacks with bold assertions, and they do it with such confidence and with such long faces and upward eye rollings that it is a little hard to stand up in their presence and on the spur of the moment contradict what they say. I have been trying to load up a little on this subject. [Laughter.] Here is one sample of the ammunition I have been able to gather——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. STONE. Always—with pleasure.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I hesitate to break in upon this enlightening discourse of the Senator from Missouri; but, in the interest of the orderly conduct of the business of the Senate, I feel that I must ask that the regular order be proceeded with.

Mr. STONE. Well, the Senator from Utah desires to be heard, and therefore I suppose the Senator from Pennsylvania does not wish now to urge the regular order so much.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Missouri has any right to break into the regular order of the business of the Senate in this way. He can talk upon this subject at the proper time; but this is not the proper time.

Mr. JAMES. Nobody objected to the Senator from Utah proceeding the other day.

Mr. STONE. How did the Senator from Utah break in?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. STONE. So did I.

Mr. OLIVER. I beg pardon of the Senator; he asked for no unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE. I said in the beginning that I wished by the consent of the Senate to submit some remarks.

Mr. OLIVER. I insist on the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. JAMES. I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if, in view of the fact that the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made a speech on this subject by unanimous consent, in granting which this side participated, would the Senator now call for the regular order and shut off the Senator from Missouri, who is replying to the speech of the Senator from Utah, under such circumstances? Is that the idea of fairness the Senator from Pennsylvania would invoke in this Chamber?

Mr. OLIVER. There can be no objection to the Senator from Missouri proceeding at the proper time with his remarks.

Mr. STONE. Very well; I will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I sincerely trust that the Senator from Pennsylvania will withdraw his request that the regular order be proceeded with. I should like to hear the Senator from Missouri conclude, and I think that he ought to be allowed to conclude.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I thought the Senator from Missouri was through. I have listened to his remarks, but he is now starting out upon a new line, and we do not know where he will lead us.

Mr. STONE. No; the Senator does not know where I am going to lead him; that is the trouble with him. [Laughter.] The Senator does not want to be led. He is like some other creatures that I know of, distinguished in my State; you can lead them to water, but you can not make them drink; you can tell the Senator the truth, but he will not absorb it. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I am willing to hear the truth at all times, and I am always amused when listening to the Senator from Missouri; but just now I happen to be looking forward to saying something myself on another subject, and I should like the Senator to get through in some reasonable time. I withdraw my point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. STONE. Oh, I thought the Senator would withdraw it in due time and on proper solicitation from agreeable sources.

The letter I was going to read from this very prominent and leading farmer in my State is as follows. Let me read now from Mr. Adams's letter:

> Public sentiment here is strongly behind Wilson. Of course, there are knockers—

Yes; knockers there, as there are here—

> Of course, there are knockers; we expect that; but the thinking business people are all pleased with the tariff and the bank bill, and are behind Wilson in Mexico, too. Now, listen: Wool is selling at 21 cents per pound, the highest price in 10 years; frying chickens 35 cents, old hens 13 cents, hogs 8 cents on foot, and an ordinary yearling calf brings $40 and up; horses and mules almost out of sight. Manufactured goods are lower. Clothing from one-fourth to one-third; hardware down some, and sugar $4.50 a hundred pounds—it has been $6.50 and $7 per hundred for 8 or 10 years. That looks good. A man can sell a 200-pound hog for $16, buy a hundred pounds of sugar, and have $11.50 left; under the Republican tariff he could only have $9 left. Some difference; see?

Mr. President, so as not to trespass further upon the patience and good nature of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will conclude my observations this morning with this letter, asking the Senator from Utah especially to give prayerful attention to both the masterly communications I have submitted. They ought to help him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not think the short statement I made would touch the tender nerves of the Secretary of Commerce and the distinguished Senator from Missouri so keenly and wound so deeply. I made no comments in presenting the figures to speak of, and I wish to say now that I defy the Secretary of Commerce and I defy the Senator from Missouri to say that there is one assertion or one figure in the statement that is incorrect.

I have here the statement of the Department of Commerce from which I quoted every figure, and I say now that there is not one figure that I quoted that is not found in and based upon the report of the Department of Commerce—not one. I call the attention of the Senator to the very opening statement that I made:

> Mr. President, the tariff law has been in force now some six months, and it can now be judged as to what the future result of the workings of that bill will be as affecting our commerce.
> I am in receipt of the report from the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Department of Commerce, showing the total values of imports and exports of the United States for the month of April, 1914.

Mr. President, I knew well what the importations and exportations were for the last 10 months. They are found in this same report. But how often have the Senators upon the other side of the Chamber, when attention has been called in the past to the working of the bill, stated that there had not yet been time to judge of the results of the Democratic tariff bill; and I agreed with them. Orders could not be placed at once; goods could not be made at once in a foreign country; it takes time for the goods to arrive in this country; and it was unfair to judge of the workings of the tariff bill until time had elapsed. I particularly stated that the figures I gave were for the month of April; and, Mr. President, is it any better for the month of May? Are not our importations so far this month exceeding the amount of importations a year ago to a greater extent than the importations of April did a year ago last April?

I received but this morning the daily statement of the United States Treasury. I find that in the case of the receipts to the Government from customs during this month, up to date, the amount collected upon goods imported into this country is $17,742,117.43. In the case of the corresponding month and date of the fiscal year 1913, a year ago, with a rate considerably exceeding the present rate—as announced by the Senator having the bill in charge, 26 per cent ad valorem as against 42 per cent—we find that the revenue collected at that time for that particular month was $16,920,542.08. There has been collected for the Treasury of the United States for the present month, as against a year ago, $821,575.35 more up until the 26th of May, 1914. Think of the millions of dollars more that have been imported into this country at the present rate to bring about that condition.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator think the goods are being sold any cheaper?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in my investigation I have failed to find a case where they have been sold cheaper.

Mr. REED. Then, if they are not sold any cheaper, why is it that they should come in at all, if the prices remain just the same as they did before?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, that question has been asked and answered at least a hundred times in the Senate; but I will answer the Senator once more.

Mr. REED. I should like to hear it answered once.

Mr. SMOOT. I will gladly do so if I can, and I hope it will be to the satisfaction of the Senator from Missouri; but if not I can not help it.

The goods that are imported into this country are imported at a cost slightly below the goods that are made in this country—just enough below to secure the order. When they arrive, they are in the hands of the importer. The difference between the cost in a foreign country and in this, and the difference between the price for which the importer sells the goods and the price which the ultimate consumer pays is divided, first, with the foreign manufacturer; second, with the importer; third, with the wholesalers and jobbers of this country; and, fourth, with the retailer. The customer at the end receives no benefit.

Take, for instance, gloves. A difference of $1 a dozen in the cost of gloves would mean a great advantage to an importer; it would, in some cases, mean a fair profit. But do you think the retailer is going to sell a $2 pair of gloves for any less than he did before? That has been demonstrated so many times that I thought everybody understood it.

By the way, Mr. President, at this particular time I wish to disavow any of the credit that the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] undertakes to ascribe to me for the passage of the Payne-Aldrich bill. I had not the bill in charge; but I want to acknowledge that I did everything in my power to see that it did pass, humble as that may have been.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. I simply wish to ask the Senator if there are two sources of supply instead of one, and if one of those sources of supply, the foreign source, augments so that there are more goods actually brought into the country, does not that inevitably produce a reduction?

Mr. SMOOT. To the importer, the jobber, and to the retailer, yes; but not to the consumer.

Mr. REED. If the jobber——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not the time now to go into the details of this question further, because——

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] is waiting to proceed with his speech, and therefore I do not want to take the time of the Senate any longer than necessary. I simply wish to say to the Senator from Missouri and to the Senate that from the same report from which I quoted I now want to quote the excess of exports for the 10 months ending the fiscal year 1912–13, and for the year 1914. Let them speak for themselves. I care not what the Secretary of Commerce may say. These are the figures, and these figures tell the truth.

Mr. President, the excess of exports for the 10 months ending April, 1912, was $524,172,358. For 1913, $559,833,167. Now, mark you, the excess of exports for 1914 was but $474,371,465.

I care not what the Secretary of Commerce may have written to the Senator from Missouri. Those figures emanated from his office. They are the figures showing the customs receipts of the Government of the United States, and also showing the amount of exports as reported by the Department of Commerce.

In order that the Senator from Missouri may know exactly what I did say as to the excess of exports, I read from my remarks of May 20:

> The returns of the Department of Commerce show that the merchandise exports for April of this year amounted to $162,368,852, as compared with $199,813,438 for the corresponding month of last year under a protective tariff. This is, as I stated, a loss in exports of $37,434,586 in a single month.

That is what I stated, and that is exactly what the RECORD shows, and that is exactly what is shown by the statement I hold in my hand from the Department of Commerce.

Mr. STONE. Does the Senator deny that he used the words I read from his speech?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator, in quoting the words, applied the $10,000,000 to another subject matter entirely, and compared it with another subject matter—not the Secretary of Commerce—that I do not say, but the Senator, as I understood him.

Mr. STONE. The Secretary of Commerce shows that over $19,000,000 of it was for foodstuffs, raw cotton, and cotton seed. That has nothing whatever to do with the tariff.

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, cottonseed oil and foodstuffs and cotton are always exported every year; the percentage of decrease in these articles no doubt is about the same as all other goods exported. We all know there would be a less exportation of cotton if there was such a falling off in exports as was the case, but it was universal in all lines of exportations.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate any longer. I simply wish to say to the Senator and to the Senate that there is not a single statement made by me on the 20th of May that can be successfully contradicted. My statements are true; and, if the Senate will remember, I confined myself on that day to just what the figures show. I did not go into any elaborate discussion. I was not on the floor more than five minutes; but I thought what I then said ought to go into the RECORD, and for that purpose I took the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the indulgence of the Senate, not for the purpose of making any argument supplementary to the very admirable statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], but simply in order to put into the RECORD some figures with reference to our imports and exports during the past nine months, as compared with the same nine months of last year, and during the month of March of this year, as compared with the month of March of last year. I shall not attempt any discussion. I expected to do that to-morrow morning, but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has anticipated me, and I am very glad that he has done so.

Mr. President, with reference to the increase of imports and falling off of exports for the month of April, referred to by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a few days ago, during my absence on account of illness, I think it will be admitted, and if not admitted the official statistics will demonstrate the fact, that the increase in imports for that month was very largely the result of the increased imports of food products, and that the falling off in exports in that month was likewise due to the decrease in exports of certain raw products, including food products, raw cotton, cottonseed oil, and so forth.

It is a fact that for the last 16 years there has been a constant increase in our importations of food products from foreign countries. This has been due to the fact that in recent years the increase in our food production has not kept pace with the increase in our population and the increased demand for those products for domestic consumption.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Utah, if the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] will permit me to have the attention of the Senator from Utah——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is going to take but a few minutes for me to complete my statement.

Mr. OLIVER. I have no objection to the Senator putting in all the figures he wishes, but I do object to further discussion of this subject at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. The time for the Senator to have made that objection was when I asked consent that I might be allowed to make this statement. He was silent then, and I think it comes——

Mr. OLIVER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. It comes with bad grace for the Senator to interrupt me in the middle of a sentence to make this objection.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator said he did not intend to discuss the question, and he is now proceeding to discuss it, and I object to the discussion of it at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have to state facts in order that the Senate may understand the significance of the figures which I give.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania insist on the regular order?

Mr. OLIVER. I insist on the regular order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator from Pennsylvania will permit me to proceed for a few minutes.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not insist on it to the extent of objecting to the Senator putting in any figures.

Mr. SIMMONS. It will not take 10 minutes.

Mr. OLIVER. Ten minutes are too much, and even five minutes are too much. The discussion never should have taken place at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator to permit me to finish my statement.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, Mr. President, I have the reputation of being very easy, and I withdraw the objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, to show to what extent the importations of food products of this country have been increasing in recent years, I desire to put in the RECORD the fact that in 1898 our imports of food products to this country amounted to only $190,000,000, and in 1913 our importations of food products amounted to $405,000,000. This increase was under Republican tariff laws. In 1898 our export of food products amounted to $590,000,000, and in 1913, 15 years afterwards, it amounted to only $502,000,000. This falling off was under Republican tariff laws.

If the Senator from Utah had gone back to the month of March he would have seen that a condition existed that is very different from that which existed in the month of April. If you confine yourself to a single month in any year, under any tariff law—by picking out a particular month, you can show a marked discrepancy with reference to the imports and the exports of that month as compared with the like month in a previous year. That would be no indication of the current of trade at all. You must take a period extending over several months in a year in order to ascertain what is the indication of trade.

If the Senator had taken the month of March, 1913, he would have found that in that month the imports of merchandise amounted to $155,000,000, in round numbers, and to $82,000,000 in the month of March, 1914. He would have found that the exports of merchandise for the month of March, 1913, amounted to $183,000,000, while the exports for the month of March, 1914, amounted, in round numbers, to exactly the same amount—$183,000,000. In the month of March, 1914, our exports were almost exactly equal to our exports in March, 1913.

Now, take the imports for the period of nine months ending with March during the last three years. We had during those nine months in 1912 imports amounting to $1,203,000,000 in round figures, and in 1913 amounting to $1,401,000,000. In 1913, with the Payne-Aldrich law in operation, there was an increase in imports from $1,203,000,000 to $1,401,000,000 during those nine months. For 1914, during those nine months the imports were $1,398,000,000. So the imports for the nine months ending in March, 1914, were less than the imports for the nine months ending in March, 1913, when the Payne-Aldrich bill was in operation.

Now, when you come to the exports, you find that during the nine months ending in March, 1912, the exports of merchandise were $1,689,000,000; in 1913, $1,881,000,000; in 1914, for these nine months, $1,859,000,000. There was a very small falling off during the nine months ending with March, 1914, as compared with the exports for the nine months ending March, 1913.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator before he takes his seat, were these goods which we imported in sufficient quantities——

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from North Carolina if he has concluded?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have concluded; but I think the Senator ought to have the courtesy to permit the Senator from Mississippi to ask me a question.

Mr. OLIVER. If the Senator has concluded, I object to further discussion.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Never mind, I shall not insist. I just wanted to ask the Senator a question before he took his seat.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not said what I wanted to say, but owing to the impatience of the Senator from Pennsylvania, who seems this morning to be exceedingly desirous to suppress any discussion on this side in reply to what the Senator from Utah said some days ago, I will not consume any further time.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator from Pennsylvania is exceedingly patient. I do not object to the Senator from North Carolina concluding, but I do object to further discussion here on the part of other Senators.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will not interrupt the Senator further.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I had no idea of discussing anything. I wanted to ask a question of the Senator from North Carolina before he took his seat.

Mr. OLIVER. I supposed the Senator from Mississippi was only coming in with one of his little interludes. We know what that means.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will state further that I am heart and soul with the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I hope the example he now sets of discussing the tolls bill and keeping it under discussion, with nothing at any time to interfere, will be adopted by the Senate and followed out.

Mr. OLIVER. I should be glad to hear the Senator from Mississippi on one subject——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask that the tolls bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. RANSDELL. Before that is done——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business has not been concluded, and the request of the Senator from New York is not in order. We are still on the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I withdraw the request. There have been so many addresses this morning I assumed that the morning business had been closed.

COEUR D'ALENE INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. BRADY. On the 26th of May I introduced a bill appropriating $100,000 for the construction of a system of wagon roads on the Cœur d'Alene Indian Reservation in Idaho.

I have a letter which I have received from the officials of the Plummer highway district stating in very concrete form many good reasons why the bill should be passed.

Every homesteader had to pay the Government for his land. There are many Indian allotments in the district, and the Indians pay no taxes and do no work on the roads, and the homesteaders even have to pay for the right of way and must build the roads over the Indian lands. I am desirous that the records may show the great need of the passage of this bill. People have settled in the Plummer district from all parts of the United States and have taken up homesteads with the intent to build homes and develop the country. These people are among the best class of our citizens and certainly deserve this recognition. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the letter was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BOARD OF COMMISSIONERS,
PLUMMER HIGHWAY DISTRICT,
Plummer, Idaho, May 9, 1914.

Hon. JAMES H. BRADY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Inclosed herewith you will find a certified copy of our minutes of a special meeting held to-day.

The Coeur d'Alene Reservation was opened to entry May 2, 1910. Plummer is virtually the center of that reservation. People came here from all over the United States and took up homesteads with the desire to build homes and to develop the country and make it a good place in which to live. Homesteaders, as you know, are poor, ordinarily. There was not one mile of road built within miles of the village of Plummer. There were no roads laid out, even. Homesteaders cut trails across the mountains to reach some place where they could secure supplies.

In 1912 we formed a highway district under the laws of the State. We bonded ourselves for $45,000 in the year 1913. We taxed ourselves for the purpose of building roads as heavily as we could, with the result that we will have in taxes this year about $16,000, all told. This indicates we believe, the good faith of the people here. It shows that they are in earnest, that they are taking the Government domain that was raw land and are attempting to change it into farms and beautiful homes.

Every homesteader had to pay the Government for his land. The country is sprinkled with Indian allotments. The Indians pay no taxes, do no work on the roads, but, on the contrary, charge the people for a right of way, and the people must build over these Indian lands. These roads benefit the Indians as much as they do anyone else. This is a hard country to build roads in. Brush must be cut, stumps must be blown out, and the roads graded at great expense. Under the circumstances, we believe that no one would oppose a bill appropriating the sum of $100,000 to the Plummer Highway District for the purpose of building a system of roadways. Nothing could do more to build up the country, and in view of the hardships and the sufferings that homesteaders here have gone through, no one is more entitled to Federal aid.

We would like to impress upon you as forcibly as we can the necessity of the appropriation which we ask. It would simply be a case where the Government would be treating its own homesteaders in a manner in which they deserve to be treated.

We therefore ask and petition you that you use your best efforts to have the appropriation we ask for passed at this session of Congress.

If there is anything that we can do to help you in the matter, kindly let us know.

Very respectfully,

THE PLUMMER HIGHWAY DISTRICT,
WILLIAM HOUCK,
President Board of Commissioners.
WILLIAM RIORDAN, Commissioner.
MAHLON E. HARVEY, Commissioner.

Attest:

GEORGE J. MCFADDEN, Secretary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which were referred the following bills, submitted adverse reports thereon, which were agreed to, and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 3869) to amend the military record of John Morrow (Rept. No. 564); and

A bill (S. 3989) for the relief of Alfred E. Smith (Rept. No. 565).

RESTORATION OF ANNUITIES.

Mr. LEWIS. In behalf of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] I ask that the bill (H. R. 11246) for the restoration of annuities to the Medawakanton and Wahpakoota (Santee) Sioux Indians, declared forfeited by the act of February 16, 1863, be taken from the calendar and recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MABLE PETERS AND LORETTA PETERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 369. I call the attention of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] to the report, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object to this resolution on account of its nature, but I shall object to the consideration of any bills during the morning hour.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should not ask for the consideration of any measure that would take much time. This is merely the usual routine matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to Mable Peters and Loretta Peters, sisters of George Peters, late a messenger to the Committee on Patents, a sum equal to six months' salary, at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered as including funeral expenses and all other allowances.

SENATOR FROM MARYLAND.

Mr. KERN. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections to submit a report (No. 566) relative to the claim of Hon. BLAIR LEE for $2,500 for expenses and counsel fees made necessary by the objections made to his taking his seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Maryland. Accompanying the report is a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 379) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the sum of $1,500 be paid to BLAIR LEE out of the contingent fund of the Senate, which payment shall be in full of all demands of the said BLAIR LEE for expenses incurred by him in the proceedings involving the validity of his credentials and his right to a seat in this body.

HON. FRANK P. GLASS.

Mr. KERN. From the Committee on Privileges and Elections I submit a report (No. 567) relative to the claim presented by Frank P. Glass for $2,889.53 for personal expenses and counsel fees in the prosecution of his application to be admitted to a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama. Accompanying the report is a resolution, which I ask may be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 380) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the sum of $1,500 be paid to Frank P. Glass out of the contingent fund of the Senate, which payment shall be in full of all demands of the said Glass for expenses incurred by him in the proceedings brought to establish his right to a seat in this body under the appointment of the governor of Alabama.

PRIBILOF ISLANDS FUR SEAL.

Mr. THORNTON. From the Committee on Fisheries I report back favorably, with an amendment, the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 150) providing for the taking for purposes of illustration of 30 specimens of Pribilof Islands fur seal for the collection of the United States National Museum. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution, for the reason that it is necessary to act promptly, because the Commissioner of Fisheries has just left for Alaska, and it will be necessary for him to make the collection this summer in order to make it available.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The amendment was, in line 4, after the word "taken," to strike out "from" and insert "for," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized to have taken for the collections of the United States National Museum a series of specimens of the Pribilof Islands fur seal, to properly illustrate the range of variation in both sexes at all ages, said collection not to exceed 30 specimens in number.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted an amendment relative to the rights of the Mississippi Choctaw Indians whose names do not appear upon the approved rolls of the Choctaws in Oklahoma, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. ROBINSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $334,435 for labor and material required in the installation of a drainage system in the city of Hot Springs, Ark., to care for storm waters from the mountains of the Hot Springs Reservation and for perfecting a sanitary sewer system in that city, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

NAVAL CLAIMS.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5489) making appropriation for payment of certain claims in accordance with findings of the Court of Claims, reported under the provisions of the acts approved March 3, 1883, and March 3, 1887, and commonly known as the Bowman and the Tucker Acts, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL EXPENSES OF THE LATE SENATOR BRADLEY.

Mr. JAMES submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 381), which was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, from the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the Senate, the actual and necessary expenses incurred by the committee appointed by the President of the Senate in arranging for and attending the funeral of the late Senator William O. Bradley, from the State of Kentucky, vouchers for the same to be approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

NEW YORK CENTRAL & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD CO.

Mr. NORRIS. I submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 382) was read, as follows:

Whereas the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co., through its ownership of the stock of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., forms a continuous line of railway from Chicago, through Buffalo, to New York City; and

Whereas said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls by lease the West Shore Railroad Co.; and the said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. owns the stock of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. (Nickel Plate), which, together with the said West Shore Railroad Co., constitutes a railroad running parallel to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. and the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. from Chicago, through Buffalo, to New York City; and

Whereas said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. owns the stock in the Western Transit Co. and the Rutland Transit Co., constituting a water-navigation line engaged in interstate commerce between Buffalo and Chicago and intermediate points; and

Whereas this ownership results in a combination under one control of four competing lines of transportation between Chicago and Buffalo and two competing lines between Buffalo and New York City; and

Whereas the said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., in addition to the ownership of the said New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., owns all of the stock of the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Co.; of the Chicago, Indiana & Southern Railroad Co.; and of the Jamestown, Franklin & Clearfield Railroad Co.; and also owns more than 50 per cent of the stock of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co.; and

Whereas the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls the Western Maryland Railway Co., which together with the said Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co. constitutes another competing line between territory covered by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. and the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. with the Atlantic seaboard; and

Whereas the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. is now taking the necessary steps to more completely consolidate all of the aforesaid railroads, together with others, under one ownership and control: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the various combinations of railroads above set forth are in violation of the Sherman antitrust law or any other statute of the United States, and whether the Department of Justice has in contemplation any action for the dissolution of said combination.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Has this resolution been before a committee of the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an original resolution submitted by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. REED. I think a resolution of its importance ought to go to a committee. If I have caught its import, I am heartily in accord with it; but to have a resolution read without having it printed and thus being before the Senate, and immediately put on its passage without any consideration, and especially a resolution of this importance, demanding statements from a department, it seems to me is not according that degree of care which we ought to manifest. I repeat, if I have properly understood the resolution, I shall probably be heartily in accord with it; but it is a little hasty, it seems to me, to have a resolution offered in this way, with unanimous consent asked for its consideration, and action expected on the instant. Is not the Senator from Nebraska willing to let the resolution lie over for a day, so that we may examine it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. REED. I did not wish to put it in that form.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to say to the Senator that an objection, of course, will take the resolution over until to-morrow, and I have no objection to its going over. I am perfectly willing, if the Senator from Missouri or any other Senator desires to examine the resolution, to allow it to go over. It only calls for certain information from the Attorney General, and, I repeat, I have no objection to its going over until to-morrow, if the Senator from Missouri desires that it shall do so in order that he may fully examine it.

Mr. REED. I made the request, but I did not wish to put it in the form of an objection. I should, however, like an opportunity to examine the resolution, and I probably shall be in favor of it when I shall have examined it. I ask that it may go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over until to-morrow.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL RESERVE DISTRICTS.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to ask for a reconsideration of the order of the Senate for the printing of certain briefs and articles presented to the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board relative to the location of reserve districts in the United States. I make this request for the purpose of amending the order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is reconsidered.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the letter of the reserve bank organization committee submitted to the Senate May 18, 1914, transmitting the briefs and arguments presented to the organization committee of the Federal Reserve Board relative to the location of reserve districts in the United States, together with such accompanying maps and diagrams as may be necessary, be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. President, by way of explanation, I will say that the first order did not give authority for the printing of maps and diagrams and accompanying documents. I have since that time gone over the maps and diagrams with the printing clerk and have eliminated such as are not necessary, and this order merely contemplates the printing of those that are necessary to explain the written matter.

I ask for the entry of the order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

RURAL CREDITS.

On motion of Mr. HOLLIS, it was Ordered, That 8,000 additional copies of the bill (S. 5542) to provide capital for agricultural development, to create a standard form of investment based upon farm mortgages, to equalize rates of interest upon farm loans, to furnish a market for United States bonds, to provide a method of applying postal savings deposits to the promotion of the public welfare, and for other purposes, be printed for the use of the Senate document room.

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN D. RYAN.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I send to the desk a copy of an address delivered yesterday before the national foreign-trade convention by a distinguished citizen of Montana, Hon. John D. Ryan, entitled "The Sherman Law and its Effect on Export Trade." It deals with an important feature of the trust problem now engaging the attention of Congress. I ask that it may be printed as a Senate document, for the information of Members of both Houses.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow it to be referred to the Committee on Printing?

Mr. WALSH. I will be very glad to have that done.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the course that is usually taken in such matters.

Mr. WALSH. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The address will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

DEMOCRACY IN BANKING.

Mr. JAMES. I ask to have printed in the RECORD an address by John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, delivered before the annual convention of the North Carolina Bankers' Association in the house of representatives at the capitol at Raleigh May 13, 1914, on the subject of Democracy in Banking.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow it to be referred to the Committee on Printing, just as all similar matters are?

Mr. JAMES. I desire it printed in the RECORD. I do not wish to have it printed as a public document, but merely that it be printed in the RECORD. It is a very able address.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any question as to that, nor have I any desire to withhold it from publication.

Mr. JAMES. It is not usual to have referred to the Committee on Printing matters intended to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; not if it is only intended for the RECORD.

Mr. JAMES. This is only for the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOCRACY IN BANKING.

[Address of John Skelton Williams, Comptroller of the Currency, delivered before the annual convention of the North Carolina Bankers' Association in the house of representatives at the capitol at Raleigh, May 13, 1914.]

Mr. President and members of the North Carolina Bankers' Association, about a week from now those of you who believe in the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence will celebrate it. Maybe some of those who will celebrate will have doubts, and I shall not undertake either to change those doubts to full faith or to confirm them. The Government assumes that I am to do a certain amount of work for it, and experience proves that he who becomes thoroughly involved and interested in discussion of the Mecklenburg declaration, whether for the affirmative or the negative, will have no time left for other matters. Whether Thomas Jefferson, of Virginia, borrowed his declaration from the work of a talented North Carolinian may be left, like that other question between the two States—of which sent to the front the gallant soldier whose lifeblood flowed highest on the heights of Gettysburg—for each man to decide for himself. In both those great events of American history there is honor enough for all the participants.

My purpose is to talk to you of a new declaration of independence, involving no shock of arms, no shedding of blood, no severance of ties, yet mighty in its consequences for the present and the times to come after. Nowhere in the world could such a theme be presented more appropriately than in the capital of a people who from the beginning of their history on this continent have been foremost in protest against error, evil, and oppression; most restless under injustice; most energetic in demand for freedom, and the rights conferred by freedom and constituting it.

The new banking law, of which I, as Comptroller of the Currency, am asked to talk to you North Carolina bankers, is not only a declaration but a guaranty of the freedom of the financial and commercial interests of our country from the possibility of the rule of a small group of men, sometimes unknown, sometimes too well known.

It is a plan of decentralization and distribution, demanded by the expansion and growth of our Republic. It is not intended to injure anybody, and it will not injure any but those who insist on being injured, and let us hope that there will be none such. There is strength in voluntary and accepted unity, but there is none in servitude of units enforced by law. There is vigor irresistible in the willing combination of many for a common purpose. There is weakness and inevitable and infinite corruption in the concentration of power which means tyranny on one side and enslavement on the other. We have been living in swaddling clothes, which have become fetters—tightened or loosened by a few strong hands. Alternately business has been stimulated to feverish and sometimes wild exertion, and given knock-out drops, reducing it to helplessness and the very appearance of death. We have grown, but the growth has been uneven and therefore sometimes unhealthy. Too often our prosperity has been of the kind that shows in statistics splendid aggregates, but is not felt or enjoyed by the average individual citizen.

The system we have endured through half a century hampered us, because it checked our growth and was unequal to our needs. It was dangerous—deadly dangerous—not only because it compressed control of our increasing resources and wealth into the keeping of a small number of individuals at certain great centers, but because it aided in the heaping up of vast fortunes, inciting discontent and resentment, the parents of revolution, the forerunners of destruction.

Poverty is not always felt acutely until contrasted with riches. Inequalities vividly evident are the worst foes of any Government, the surest evidence of its inadequacy, the urgent signals for its amendment. When nobody is swollen abnormally with riches nobody feels pinched or is made angry or desperate by lack of them.

This new measure is part of a general and deep movement for a new life, new standards, new methods for the United States. A change is necessary and is coming, and common sense tells us to prepare ourselves and our affairs for it. When loans and discounts of the national banks in the 50 reserve and central reserve cities increase, as they have done, from $1,800,000,000 in 1903 to more than $3,000,000,000 in 1914 we surely need a banking and currency system with the capacity to stretch and give.

When a dozen men own among themselves $1,600,000,000, and through a system of interlocking directorates control as much more directing an amount equal to the total currency supply for 100,000,000 people, we should realize that such power is a peril, not only to our commerce and to the people at large, but to the Government itself. I have heard it said those men have held this huge Republic by the throat, but if that statement is strong, we do know that under the conditions which have existed they could precipitate a panic or force artificial and injurious activity at their will. Working from ambush, seen by none, felt by all, they could have shaken the credit of the country so as to paralyze and make in time of peace ruin and desolation worse than war. There is no need to quarrel with these men. Considering what they could and might have done, we may say, as was said of Warren Hastings in India, we are astonished at their moderation.

Some of these commanders in chief of finance and captains of industry have proved that they had high patriotic instincts and came to the help of the Government and people in time of stress. Others had the sound wisdom to realize that their real prosperity and the stability of their great possessions were best promoted by reasonable prosperity and hopefulness among the masses of the people. Yet it is not right or safe that the happiness and hope of all these scores of millions of our citizens should depend on the mercy, the caprice, or the opinions of any 12 or 50 or 100 men.

Some of the greatest fortunes, the magnitude of which takes the breath of the ordinary man and strains his imagination, are results of our system of banking and finance, of a protective tariff, taxing many for the benefit of the few, and of laxity in the enforcement of laws, inadequate and feeble at their best. They are dangerous not only to the general body of the people but to their possessors, and it must be remembered that a huge mass of money does not always either prove or supply wisdom, and to the contrary sometimes upsets it.

There is a suggestion of cynical satire in the mythological story that King Midas, whose touch changed to gold everything upon which it fell, was given at last the ears of an ass. He prayed to the gods to relieve him of the rich but deadly faculty which forbade him even from eating food possible to digest. So men with the genius, the faculty, the instinct—whatever it is—for what we call making money may well pray for a law or dovetailing plan of laws forbidding them from piling up money in quantities greater than any man can use comfortably or can be intrusted with safety.

There is no natural limit to greed and the ambition to acquire. If we can not provide artificial limitations we can, at least, devise and provide plans to prevent centralization and to protect the public. As we have seen within the last few years, men who have learned arrogant confidence in the overwhelming power of gathered gold have been led, perhaps almost imperceptibly to themselves, to use it for the mastery of politics and legislation. The man of the most ordinary mind must know that secret partnership between private capital and the machinery of government is far more destructive to both than could be any assault of either on the other. An open wound may be healed and a direct attack may be repelled, but hidden rot in the vitals will kill the strongest living thing, and poison saps the sources and roots of life.

We were led unseeing from the concentration of financial power to the concentration of political by the aid of financial power; from the interlocking directorates to the interlocking of the interests and influence of the concealed controllers of money, and the known leaders of political parties. We lived beneath a potent despotism; we could not see a touch or quite understand, but which every man of us could realize and feel every day of his life.

We could see things done; effects were before us plainly. But we could not know how nor by whom they were done nor the processes by which the effects were produced. We stood on a gathering volcano of unrest. Observing men could note the symptoms and threats, but were bewildered in seeking causes.

No sane or patriotic man or party or administration desires to seek vengeance, to destroy, overthrow, or uproot. All sane and patriotic men will understand that the time has come to reconstruct, to rebuild on a better and broader plan than we have used heretofore. We need to replace the foundation, to discard the patchwork and false work on which we have operated. The strongest, surest, the deepest foundation possible for our financial structure is the confidence and assured safety and contentment of the people who do the voting, with whom rests the final decision—the ultimate giant power, which, blinded and strong, would pull away the pillars of the temple; which, seeing and working intelligently and hopefully, will help, in our work of building, those of us who are trying to build.

We have grown and prospered in spite of an imperfect, repressing, and perilous banking and currency system. We have grown as a vine sometimes forces its way through a crevice in a wall, our very growth inviting disaster and death, our wonderful vitality hastening catastrophe, because the more brilliant the flower and the more abundant the fruit the sooner must the withering be when the roots are among stones and can gather no new life. Over 50 years of growth under the old banking act has been forced by the generosity of the soil of a new land, by the unconquerable energy and resiliency of a virile and courageous people; yet it has been interrupted by periods of business depression and stagnation; our progress punctuated by panics, discreditable, appalling—to many ruinous. These have usually come at intervals of about 10 years, more or less, sometimes preceded by long months of sickening apprehension, sometimes foreseen by the far-seeing, sometimes bursting upon us with dreadful suddenness. The immediate results, seen by all, have been crashing of banks and trusted commercial houses, the wholesale stoppage of industries, the wiping away or cruel draining of the results of honest thrift, denial to willing and hungry labor of the opportunity to earn bread and shelter.

We believe one of the most valuable and beneficial effects of this new banking bill will be to make such panics as we have had in the past virtually impossible. When there is confidence there can be no panic. The panic is, as its name signifies, fear, distrust. When the people know that their financial institutions are stable, that behind them stands a Gibraltar of solid assets, that checks will be honored on presentation, and that their deposits are safe, there is no fear or doubt. It is a familiar maxim that a bank is like a woman's reputation—likely to be injured by the faintest whisper. When the banks have behind them substantially the combined strength of all other banks and supplies of currency ready to answer their needs, limited practically only by their valid values, malice can not invent nor credulity or ignorance accept reports to hurt or drag them down.

Nor will their credit or their lives any longer be held at the mercy of any so-called Money Trust. Help for their just needs will be theirs by right, by requirement of law; they can ask with high confidence of receiving aid, instead of depending for it on the doubtful answer to their supplications. They will not know, as many of them have known, the misery of begging vainly for the use of their own money held by reserve or central reserve banks, and of suffering impairment or disaster because of being denied return of what they had intrusted for safekeeping. A leading banker of Seattle, vice president of the clearing house, testified before the reserve bank organization committee, sitting in that city a few weeks ago, as follows:

"Let us go back," said he, "for a moment to the panic of 1907. If we could have drawn our money in this district from Chicago, New York, and St. Louis we would not have known that there was a panic in existence. Conditions were all right out here, but our resources were simply tied up and we were helpless."

Understand it is not assumed or promised that this new law will perform the functions of Divine Providence—shower blessings on everybody or establish universal prosperity. Nor will it bolster up or save banks improvidently, recklessly, or corruptly managed. It is intended to enable banks honestly and sagaciously conducted to enjoy the legitimate results of their own integrity and sagacity. Its purpose is to enable the natural and just laws of trade, beautiful, symmetrical, and sane, when undisturbed—as is the law of gravitation—to work to their results naturally and smoothly. It will provide no artificial stimulant or prop. It will remove artificial barriers to prosperity, unnecessary burdens, perils, and impediments. It can not provide immunity from such disasters as short crops, great fires or earthquakes, or disorders at home, or complications abroad. It will, we think, restrain the effects of these within the limits of the unavoidable and prevent them from being exaggerated and wantonly magnified in their effects.

It will save prudence and good faith from sharing the punishment earned by imprudence and bad faith, perhaps a thousand miles away. It will guard straight and open business against the evils brought by crooked and crafty business. It will protect sturdy conservation and well-intended enterprise from the violence, the cupidity, and the mastery of dollars assembled and used for brigandage; establish barricades about capital properly employed against what a distinguished traveler and expert has described as "predatory wealth." It is hoped and believed that this law will prevent the alternating money gluts and money famines daily reported in the newspapers, by providing supplies of money to flow automatically, responsive to need. We can not see how it is possible with this law that we can undergo again the dismal, man-killing, heart-racking conditions of 1907 and 1893 and other "panic years," when money could not be borrowed for any emergency or on any collateral or terms; or that it will hereafter be within the power of any group or confederation of financiers, however ravenous, cruel, or crazed, to force a panic or conditions to cause one; for the money supply may not hereafter be impounded, locked up, or deviated from its channels, but should rise irresistibly to the level of the necessity.

The history of commerce teaches us that the business man can provide against every danger that may come in the natural course of things; he is overwhelmed by manufactured explosions or insidious attacks coming suddenly from rear or flank. We are told that for every disease, loss, or pain nature inflicts she provides a remedy; that for every sorrow and trouble permitted by Divine Providence to come upon the sons of men there is alleviation. It remained for the rapacious ingenuity or blundering blindness of man, or the two in diabolic combination, to devise hurts for which there is no relief but comprehensive changes of systems and machinery.

New York has become the commercial capital of the country, the great citadel of the money power, the reservoir of money supply. It is the walled city from which the barons have levied tribute on a territory and population vaster than any lord or king of the Middle Ages dreamed of, yet sometimes using methods ruthless and savage as those of the fiercest of the robber nobles—forays and levies devastating by scientific, artful methods; pillaging under form of law, smiting with swords which bite deep, although we can not see them, consuming with fire which comes invisible and unsuspected. The simile seems strong, but it is justified by facts.

No sudden swoop by a feudal magnate on his peaceful neighbors was a more cruel or shameless plundering expedition than some of the transactions which have been brought to light by which the shareholders of railways and other great enterprises, established to build up the country and to promote the public interests, were despoiled. Their property and money were taken from them by the might of masses of money working stealthily. The raids had none of the attractions of the picturesque or the merit of courage. They were cold-blooded, relentless seizure of other men's goods by plots, treachery, and betrayal of trusts which should have been held sacred.

Yet it would be foolish, unjust, and wicked to hold New York as a community, or her leading citizens generally, among whom are men as high and honorable as any country contains, responsible for the misdeeds, treachery, and lawlessness of certain conspicuous offenders. Without doubt the overwhelming majority of the citizens of our great cities, as of our people generally, have viewed such violations of laws, legal and moral, with as great abhorrence as any of us, and have felt the blush of shame that such crimes are possible in this enlightened age and under the form of government which has also produced our long procession of heroes, patriots, and statesmen.

Every thinking and patriotic American must exult in New York's splendid achievements, in the glories she has built, which have made her the wonder and admiration of the world. The people of the South would be ungrateful if they forgot the generosity of her people when trouble had come upon them from fire, earthquake, and pestilence, and her purse has been opened wide to every appeal from any part of the land.

The purpose should be to change the relation of New York to the country generally from an attitude of dominating ownership to friendly partnership. Big as New York is, it is not big enough to direct the destinies of this continent. Fast as it has grown, it has not grown so fast as the United States has grown in wealth, capacity, population, thought, and aspiration.

No one reservoir is wide or strong enough to hold and control the money supply for the inconceivably tremendous activities in which we are engaged, for our endless variety of industries and enterprises, our different climates, seasons, and products, our requirements sometimes crowding and conflicting with each other. No group of men at any center, however broad in mental grasp or earnest in intent to seek the best results for all, can be intrusted safely with the unlimited and unrestrained control and direction of the flowing and recall of supplies of currency for the needs of the present, and the increasing needs that will come with the near future.

In our political affairs we impose on those to whom we intrust authority the most careful and elaborate restrictions. We draw lines beyond which no Government or representative of Government is permitted to step. We have decreed that the humblest home shall not be invaded by State or Federal officials, the smallest bit of property shall not be seized, the most obscure man shall not be deprived of his liberty without due process of law. Yet we have permitted to grow up what is aptly called an "invisible government," more powerful in many respects than the visible government, touching our daily lives more intimately and immediately than any government can do, reaching into the vaults of our banks, the safes of our merchants, the cupboards of our housewives. On the power of this we have set no limit. We have left it unrestrained. We have allowed it omnipotence without responsibility; permitted its operations to be conducted, too often, without possibility of appeal or redress.

We demand of a township constable, the pettiest officer of the law, that he give bond for faithful performance of his duties; that he shall oppress no citizen, shall faithfully return the few dollars he may collect. Under our laws control of millions and billions of dollars, power to confiscate or destroy railway systems, great manufacturing industries, towns, and cities are forced to the keeping of unknown men who give no security, are responsible to nobody, who remain undiscovered, and act frequently through acknowledged "dummies," until some accident, some chance question by an investigating Congressman, or inquiry by a newspaper reporter, brings them and their transactions into the light. Even then usually there is no provision for recovery by the injured or for punishment of the wrongdoer, no bond on which anybody can sue.

Beneath his skin every American citizen of every station and avocation, and whatever party name he may wear, is a Democrat in all the essentials and fundamentals. That is, he is attached passionately to the principles of local self-government, of the widest individual liberty compatible with the general weal and order of society. This new currency measure is democratic essentially. It looks to decentralization of direct financial control, to financial local self-government, so far as is consistent with stability and the general safety; to a currency which will be worth its face value everywhere, which will be based on the actual values it purports to represent, as well as the faith and credit of the General Government, and which yet will be elastic, expanding to meet needs where and when they develop, receding when not needed; a system fitted to meet any emergency, moving smoothly and noiselessly for the ordinary uses of business in tranquil times.

Too much money and too little money are alike evil and dangerous. Opinions differ as to which is the worse. Probably one is as bad as the other. The design of the new law is to supply just enough money or credit, when and where business needs it, to create for our commerce, as has been said, foundations so even, so broadly laid, and so deeply planted that they can not be shaken.

As it is, the country bleeds and sweats to the big financial centers. Take the South as an instance—and the conditions with which you here in North Carolina are familiar exist everywhere in the country. Most of our railway systems are controlled frequently through the trust known as the voting trust—by men who are interested in the great banks in the three central reserve cities. So it happens that the large deposits of the railways, their collections from the southern people, as also from the western people, are sent on largely to those banks. The same is true of the telegraph and telephone companies, the life and fire insurance companies, and of many of the larger manufacturing enterprises. The merchants and manufacturers of North Carolina pay their freight bills to the railways. The money goes largely and promptly to New York, and is lent out and used there in stock-market operations, or as the directors of the banks, who are also often the directors of the roads and other corporations, may elect. Of course there is no law which provides for the carrying of the reserves and bank balances of railways and industrial corporations in the central reserve cities, where the national banks of the country have also been accustomed to keep their reserves.

When North Carolina needs money to move the cotton crop her banks must call on New York for money which should be in their own vaults; for the return of money paid in here in freight bills, insurance premiums, and otherwise; and your banks sometimes think themselves lucky if they can be allowed the use of any part of it. Let us illustrate more concisely: In February last the national banks of New York and Chicago held on deposit from the banks and trust companies throughout the United States more than a thousand million dollars—an amount equal to nearly one-third of the total money in circulation in the entire country. No wonder you and the financial business men of the country shook with violent ague whenever New York chose to show indications of having cold feet. Of this thousand million dollars placed with the New York and Chicago national banks by the banks and trust companies throughout the country, less than eighty-five million, in January last, was being loaned back to the banks and trust companies of the United States. Of the balance of the money sent to the national banks of New York and Chicago, about two hundred millions was invested in bonds and securities; about three hundred millions had been loaned to noncustomers of these banks—that is to say, to borrowers who kept no accounts with them—on "bought paper" and loans secured by stock-exchange and other collateral—this is, of course, in addition to hundreds of millions which the banks were lending their own customers on stock-exchange and other similar securities.

These deposits of $1,000,000,000 placed with the national banks of New York and Chicago by other banks and trust companies are exclusive, it should be observed, of the huge balances sent on to them by the trusts and great corporations located everywhere, but controlled largely in the big cities. As you know, and as the Seattle banker I have quoted testified, there have been times when your banks were frightened or crippled because you could not get back from the banks which carried your reserves the money you had intrusted to them at 2 per cent interest to keep for you.

It is not hard to see how centralization of financial resources and money supply and concentration of financial power has been forced, and the invisible and irresponsible despotism created by acts of Congress and policies of government made necessary by those acts.

Now, we do not propose to use violence to force disintegration and decentralization, to do anything with a jolt and a jerk. It is understood clearly that to rush headlong and at full speed over an evil or an obstacle may cause derailment or jarring, uncomfortable and bad for passengers. The thought or plan, as I understand it, is to invite decentralization, to encourage it, to give opportunity for it, to make local self-government possible, to remove the influences which draw to a few centers the money that is paid out to the corporations and deposited in the local banks.

Real science is the exploration of the secrets and hidden forces of nature, and intelligent application of them when they have been discovered. This new system has been drawn with infinite pains and care on that principle—the exploration, discovery, and application of the natural laws of trade and human nature—the conditions in our own country, and our relations with other countries.

Of course, absolutely free banking is as impossible as it would be to leave to each individual the regulation of his own conduct according to his own impulses or conclusions. You would realize this more clearly than you do if you could be behind the scenes in the comptroller's office. You would learn that the banking business is one of the safest as well as one of the most worthy in the world when conducted with close compliance to the laws and regulations and the demands of honesty. Defalcations, excessive loans, and concentration of credits to single or allied interests are the three most fatal maladies.

It would do no harm if every president of a national bank would read over and study his oath of office at least once a month. I venture the assertion that some of them—present company excepted, of course—do not know what they have sworn to do and not to do. On one occasion a Member of Congress, now past history, complained personally to a Comptroller of the Currency of criticism of excessive loans made by the bank of which he was president—loans far beyond the legal limit he had sworn should not be exceeded. He did not understand really his obligations and legal limitations.

Another bank in the West that came under the observation of the comptroller's office had a board of directors composed of the president, his wife, son, daughter, and son-in-law, and reported that directors' meetings were held each morning at the breakfast table. Rather different was another bank in which the cashier and president refused to call a meeting of the directors until emphatically required by the examiner to do so. The directors appeared, rejoicing, and it was discovered that by a by-law they were entitled to $10 each for every meeting attended. The directors urged the bank examiner to call again soon, but the president was not at all hospitable.

I have taken advantage of the privilege of being the only speaker to talk to you at some length. It is an unusual and happy experience to have no competition or limitation in oratory, with the knowledge that I shall escape the criticism by taking an early train for Washington. It is delightful for a speaker to have an audience at his mercy; makes him feel quite like a New York financial potentate. Now, I will detain you just a little longer to tell you certain details of the practical operation of the new law, which may be of special interest to you.

The law does not require a single business man to change his account from the bank with which he has kept it or any business man or bank to suspend dealings with the bank or banks in the central reserve or reserve cities with which they have in the past been doing business. It does offer to banks freedom of choice. It says to the banker that he can follow his preferences, sentiments, or habit in selecting the source of his borrowing; and the member banker of any Federal reserve district may feel free and peaceful and at ease when he knows that he has in his portfolio notes, drafts, and bills of exchange arising out of actual commercial transactions, which he can convert into money at his Federal reserve bank with greater ease and promptness than it has sometimes been possible for him to withdraw his cash balances from his reserve agents and almost with as much ease as it has ever been possible to draw on credit balances with any correspondent. He is not dependent on the whims or fortunes of any other bank. He need not shiver at the prospect of abundant crops for fear he may not have available the funds with which to meet demands for moving them. He will know that if he needs money to accommodate the bank's customers he can, as a matter of right, call on his Federal reserve bank.

Secretary McAdoo last summer met with admirable foresight and wisdom the annual crop-moving scare by putting the resources of the Federal Treasury at the service of the farmers and bankers of the country just when there were evidences of a purpose to make money scarce and high and to bring on trouble. The country is under endless obligations for that, but we can not depend on having always in command of the Treasury Department a man so courageous, so ready, so careful of the public needs, and so careless of the wishes of a selfish money power.

Among other benefits the new currency law, by its direct system of clearances, will release and make available for purposes of trade and commerce hundreds of millions of dollars which under the old system have been tied up in tedious processes of collection. It will also save to banks and to merchants and business men generally some millions of dollars which they are now paying, directly and indirectly, for the collection of country checks and checks on outside cities.

To refer more particularly to your own district, the fifth, I will try to explain to you how the new method will work in transactions of domestic exchange.

In this district, embracing the States of North and South Carolina, Virginia, West Virginia (except four counties), the District of Columbia, and Maryland, there are some 475 member banks.

A cotton mill at Columbia, S. C., under the old plan sends its check on its Columbia bank for a shipment of coal to the coal company at Bluefield, W. Va. The local bank at Bluefield forwards this check to its correspondent in Richmond. This correspondent sends the check to its own correspondent in Columbia, who makes the collection from the Columbia bank and then draws a check on New York for New York exchange, which it remits to Richmond. The Richmond bank thereupon notifies the Bluefield bank of the collection of the item. The collection and exchange charges on distant country banks amount usually to from one-tenth to one-fourth of 1 per cent, or possibly more, and probably a week or more elapses between the remittance of the South Carolina check to the Bluefield bank and the time when the Bluefield bank gets its report that the item has been collected and placed to its credit in Richmond.

Under the new currency act "every Federal reserve bank shall receive on deposit at par from member banks * * * checks and drafts drawn upon any of its depositors." That means that the Bluefield bank receiving the check on the Columbia, S. C., bank mails it to the Federal reserve bank at Richmond. The Federal reserve bank at Richmond thereupon charges the Columbia bank with the amount of the check, credits the Bluefield bank with the proceeds, and notifies the two banks accordingly.

The Federal reserve act also provides that each Federal reserve bank shall receive at par, and credit accordingly, all checks and drafts drawn upon any of its member banks, from every other Federal reserve bank; that all checks and drafts drawn by any depositor—that is to say, by any member bank—on any Federal reserve bank shall be received and credited at par by every other Federal reserve bank. This means that the checks of the member banks in the country towns throughout these five States are worth their full face value, without deduction for exchange or collection charges, to every other member bank, and that the amount of each check may be cashed at par immediately, without following the devious and roundabout courses now observed in the collection of checks. Virtually every bank in the fifth district is only one night distant from Richmond, and a check mailed one afternoon in the most distant portions of the district should reach Richmond the following day in time to be included in that day's operations of the Federal reserve bank.

Let us now consider another aspect of the new law: Under the old national bank act a national bank with a capital of, say, $200,000, deposits of, say, $1,500,000, bills receivable amounting to $1,200,000, and $300,000 reserve would only be permitted to borrow a total of $200,000, the amount of its capital. If a run should start on such a bank, the amount which it could raise by loans, if strictly held to the old law, would be but $200,000, the amount of its capital, which might be quite inadequate to meet a run, and the bank, though thoroughly solvent, might be forced to suspend.

Under the new law, however, if a bank with $200,000 capital and deposits of $1,500,000 should have loaned $1,200,000 to its customers on commercial paper and should encounter an unexpected run, in addition to borrowing $200,000, the amount of its capital, such a bank would have authority to rediscount with the Federal reserve bank of which it is a member, notes, drafts, and bills of exchange issued or drawn for agricultural, industrial, or commercial purposes, having not more than 90 days to run, to any reasonable extent which may be approved by the Federal reserve bank to which application for such rediscounts may be made. In other words, if such a national bank as we have used in this illustration should have loaned the entire amount of its deposits, less the 15 per cent which it is required to keep as reserve, to its customers on acceptable commercial paper, and for any unexpected reason should be subjected to a run, the Federal reserve bank of its district would have the authority to rediscount for the member bank the entire amount of its bills receivable, as represented by its commercial paper, thus enabling the bank to pay its depositors immediately and in full.

We can not overestimate the value of the additional security which this provision of the act confers upon every honestly, capably managed member bank, and the relief from strain and anxiety and from the fear and apprehension of panics and unreasoning runs which it gives to the officers of every member bank.

Another important change provided for by the Federal reserve act is the new arrangement for the compensation of national bank examiners. Under the present law the compensation of national bank examiners is based, except as to reserve cities, on the capital stock of the bank examined. Under the operations of this law a national bank examiner has been receiving for the examination of a certain national bank in the fifth district, with over $9,000,000 of assets and many thousands of accounts, the munificent sum of $25. It is, of course, clear that an examiner could make only an imperfect examination of such a bank in the space of three days at a compensation of, say, $8 per day, out of which $8 allowance he has to pay his own railroad fare, hotel expenses, as well as clerical assistance. It is not unnatural that but few examiners would willingly spend the 10 days or two weeks which it might require to make a thorough examination of such a bank when he is running personally in debt in doing so.

Under the new currency law the Federal Reserve Board, upon the recommendation of the Comptroller of the Currency, is given authority to fix the compensation of bank examiners on the basis of annual salary, so that those banks which need additional time and attention from the examiner may receive the careful, close scrutiny which the case may call for. It is believed that the new system of bank examinations will reduce materially the number of bank failures and enable the department to check up many abuses and correct many evil situations which in the past have been ignored or glossed over by examiners in their hasty and incomplete investigations.

I thank you, gentlemen, for the opportunity to address you. Approaching the study of this new and revolutionary measure with the caution natural to every man trained in banking under the system with which we have grown up, I have become more thoroughly aroused to its merits and more deeply impressed as I have watched the methods of construction, the processes of growth, and have considered the underlying principles directing those who did the work.

It would be unjust, in congratulating ourselves upon the benefits and blessings we are to receive from this epoch-marking piece of legislation, not to acknowledge the obligations we owe for the splendid results achieved to the patient and untiring labors, resourcefulness, and constructive genius of the distinguished chairmen of the Banking and Currency Committees of the Senate and House of Representatives and to the Secretary of the Treasury, whose counsel, skill, and support in the shaping and enactment of this great measure were of inestimable value.

Here in North Carolina the records show magnificent natural progress and you have special interest in changes in the banking system which are so surely destined to promote and encourage your growth and expansion.

In the triumphs of peace and industry, as in the glories won on battle fields, and in the domain of statesmanship, all classes of your people have done full and honorable parts; have united in making the name of your State stand high and shine bright in the roll of the States in building and maintaining this mighty Republic of ours. You are living true to your record; have furnished to the Cabinet two of its ablest and most useful members, North Carolinians, tireless, faithful, and courageous, the strong supporters of huge responsibilities.

I invoke your aid to promote the success of this new system in which your calling gives you special interest and opportunity. It is a system designed to distribute the benefits and blessings of ever increasing resources and wealth equitably among your people of all stations who have done so well their respective parts toward creating your greatness. I believe this new system, for which we are indebted in a great measure to the patient guidance and masterly leadership of the scholar and statesman chosen to the Presidency, will bring new strength, new scope, new assurance to our entire commercial system, and for your State and my State and all the States and the people as a whole mean deliverance from dangers that beset us, and a new career of advancement based on the solid foundation of real substance, honesty, justice, and democracy in its highest meaning and purpose.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. RANSDELL. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting and learned article on rivers and harbors. It is entitled "The Inside of the Pork Barrel," by Hon. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, published in the Saturday Evening Post of May 23.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLINGER. What is the request?

Mr. RANSDELL. That an article on the river and harbor bill entitled "The Inside of the Pork Barrel," by Hon. BENJAMIN G. HUMPHREYS, of Mississippi, published in the Saturday Evening Post of May 23, may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is a most interesting pork barrel—the river and harbor bill. I have been looking at it, and if this throws any light on the subject I think we ought to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. It throws a good deal of light on it, and I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will read it and that every other Senator will read it.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE INSIDE OF THE PORK BARREL.

[By B. G. Humphreys.]

In a few days Congress is going to pass an omnibus river and harbor bill, and then in a few more days the newspapers will be discoursing on the evils of the pork barrel—and why not? Heaven knows they frequently discourse on much worse things, though rarely, it must be admitted, on topics about which they really know quite so little.

The first thing one does when he leaves the grammar school is to forget his geography. Why should these gentlemen who write editorials for our great newspapers, and who know about tariffs and things, burden their minds with mere geography? Why bother about Raccoon Creek when it is so easy to remember the Suwanee River? Why keep such prosy old names as Pollock Rip and Cooper River in mind when it is so much pleasanter to let one's thoughts rest on the banks of the Wabash, or where rolls the Oregon?

A good Massachusetts friend, for many years a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, told us that a Harvard man took him to task on one occasion for wasting money on so many insignificant and worthless streams. "Why," he replied, "the trouble is not with the legislation—it is with you; you don't know the geography of your country." Naturally this was protested. "Well, I will name a river in this country navigable for 300 miles that you never heard of." And naturally enough this, too, went to protest. "The Coosa." And his friend owned up.

When the new man comes to Congress he has to start something—so many of them believe; and about the surest way to the headlines is to denounce the pork barrel. A very wise old man told me many years ago down in Mississippi, when I was beginning to look around politically and take notice, that the very best thing a young man so intentioned could do was to get into a fight with the devil. "It does not make much difference what devil it is. An imaginary one will answer the purpose, just so you fight him loud." Since that day I have come to believe that this old sage has lectured pretty generally around this country.

THE INTRACOASTAL CANAL.

When the river and harbor bill was before Congress a year ago one of this old teacher's pupils grew almost eloquent—at any rate, he fought loud—denouncing the pork barrel. Naturally he was requested to indicate the particular project he wished to have eliminated, so he concluded to read the bill and try to guess the answer. The House adjourned over Sunday, and when we resumed consideration of the bill on Monday he was ready to specify. Somebody has had a big map of the United States printed, with a broad blue strip running from Boston a short distance inland along the whole Atlantic coast, across Florida, around the Gulf to the Mexican border.

This is supposed to indicate the course of the intracoastal canal. The usual amount of study devoted to this project consists of a more or less casual glance at the map and a somewhat more definite "Well, I'll be darned!" The real project for this inland route may be stated in a few words, and a somewhat careful examination of the map will probably suggest the thought that it is manifestly feasible. A cut across Cape Cod—and private enterprise is now making it—gives a protected course behind Long Island into New York from Boston. The tonnage actually carried now and subjected to the dangers of the passage through Marthas Vineyard and round Cape Cod is difficult to ascertain with exactness. It is very large—just how many millions can only be roughly estimated, but certainly larger than the tonnage that passes through the Suez Canal; and the passenger traffic is enormous.

Surely it would not be a foolish thing to make the way safe. The next cut is across New Jersey from Raritan Bay to the Delaware River, and private enterprise dug that many years ago. The next cut is across Delaware from the river to Chesapeake Bay; and there, too, private enterprise has long since constructed the Delaware & Chesapeake Canal. Running down this protected course several hundred miles through Chesapeake Bay, the next cut is from the Chesapeake to Albemarle Sound.

Strangely enough, these two waters are already connected by two privately dug canals—one through the Dismal Swamp; the other known as the Chesapeake & Albemarle Canal. The traffic carried through both these canals, though the depth is only 6 feet, was given as 700,000 tons the year before Congress purchased the last named. All of it, of course, was compelled to pay toll to the companies that owned and operated them. It would require an ordinary freight train of 30 loaded cars two trips daily every day in the year to transport this tonnage.

Just what the saving to the commerce of the coast will amount to when this canal is deepened and widened and made a free waterway can only be guessed; but the Engineer Corps of the Army, after a very thorough study of the question, reported that the expense of the improvement, including the purchase price, was justified by the needs of commerce; and thereupon Congress adopted the project. It will enable the smaller craft engaged in the coastwise trade to avoid the storms and hidden reefs off Cape Hatteras, the most dangerous point on our Atlantic seaboard, where many fortunes and human lives are annually lost.

From Beaufort to Savannah the difficulty will be greater, but future Congresses may find it worth while to undertake this section. From Savannah to Key West the project will require little excavation and the cost will be small.

Along the Gulf of Mexico nature has providently so disposed the sea islands as to provide this section of the canal almost without the necessity for human activities to amplify. Look at the map if your curiosity or interest is roused.

However, as one of those immortals who used to gather around the table at the coffeehouse and hear Dr. Johnson's long sentences expressed it, "This is going far afield." I must return to our friend the orator. To use expressive slang, the intracoastal canal "got its!" It was the biggest and the greasiest piece of pork in the barrel! When Clearwater Harbor was reached in the bill it must be stricken out. The chairman explained that this was not a part of this inland waterway.

"Judging from its name I had assumed that it must be some distance inland," the objector explained. Most natural assumption. How could Clearwater Harbor be near the ocean? Traversing the broad prairies from the land of the cactus on his triumphal march to the Nation's Capital, he had crossed many rivers—the Red, the Arkansas, and even the Father of Waters. All were rushing in tawny currents on and into the sea, and surely this common receptacle of so much silt must be the muddiest hole in Christendom. Clearwater Harbor near the ocean—the idea!

The rivers whose improvement and maintenance are provided for in the bill now pending in Congress floated last year a commerce amounting to 203,313,128 tons. This is exclusive of the traffic on the rivers connecting the Great Lakes, and does not include the tonnage of our harbors. These figures will be more readily understood when compared with the tonnage of other transportation routes which hold a prominent place in the public mind. Mr. Emery Johnson, the official expert upon whose figures the House relied when the rate of tolls was fixed for the Panama Canal, estimated that the total tonnage which would pass through the canal in 1915 would be ten and a half million tons. The tonnage of the Suez Canal for 1912 was 20,125,120 tons. The freight carried from coast to coast by all our transcontinental railroads combined is 3,000,000 tons. It is estimated that the coastwise traffic which will pass through the canal will be 1,250,000 tons annually, and it is the exemption or nonexemption of this million and a quarter tons from the payment of tolls which has caused so much acrimonious debate. In other words, the rivers, large and small, for which we are providing in our rivers and harbors bills, float nearly as much tonnage annually as will pass through the Panama Canal and the Suez Canal, plus the cross-continent tonnage of all the railroads during the next 10 years.

SENATOR BURTON'S CHANGE OF TUNE.

Then the creeks and the insignificant rivers—what of the money wasted in their improvement? Surely this is pork, and distributed, too, among the Members in such fashion as to make the passage of the barrel certain. What a curious notion, that a Congressman could gain favor at home by securing appropriations of money to waste on worthless creeks! Surely this could gain votes only in the immediate vicinity of the miserable creek, and there better than anywhere else would it be known that the money was in fact being wasted. Are the people dunces? Do these creeks all flow through the grounds of some insane asylum? Otherwise how could a Congressman gain popular favor by reckless expenditures of the tax-raised money on impossible and worthless creeks?

Senator BURTON was chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee for 10 years. During that time he spent much money on the Great Lakes and viewed the magical growth of commerce there with commendable pride. He also spent much money on the ridiculous creeks, and was severer perhaps than anyone else in his judgment and in his criticisms of those who spoke of the pork barrel. When the first rivers and harbors bill, after he reached the Senate, was reported to that body, word came over to the House that he was making a most vigorous attack on it. Pork barrel, in fact, had been one of the phrases used.

D. S. Alexander, one of the most conscientious patriots who ever served in Congress, and certainly one of the most lovable of men, had been Mr. BURTON'S pupil for those 10 years and now had succeeded to the chairmanship of the House committee. He had framed this bill on the identical lines so long laid down and so well defended by Mr. BURTON, and he refused to believe the story. The old Members followed him post haste to the other Chamber, to be resolved if Brutus so unkindly knocked or no. Which particular rôle he was essaying, Brutus or Casca, nobody knew. All soon were aware, however, that he was knocking, and knocking hard at that.

The Brazos, the Trinity, and some other projects that were the children of his own brain—or, at least, had been ushered into this breathing world under his skillful legislative attention—shared the shafts of his forceful criticisms. In this he seemed to be playing no favorites, whatever else he might be playing.

Alexander was speechless; but being a Member of the House, and at the moment only a visitor de gratia in the Senate, this was not surprising; the rules required it. He had known Saul of Tarsus, but this was Paul! After it was over he led his committee colleagues back to the House, a madder if not a wiser man. They believed the great Senator, at whose feet they had learned how to frame river and harbor bills, had for some reason put an antic disposition on. The charge of pork barrel, however, had been revived and this time sponsored by a man whose opinion was worth something and whose words carried weight.

The old adage says that bad news travels fast. There are some stories that are hardly to be classed as bad news, but that are nevertheless entitled to honorable mention in these speed contests. Videlicet: Once upon a time there was an old priest, Abbé Huc, who visited China and wrote a book, in which he said the Yellow River had, by reason of the levees along its banks, filled its channel until the bottom of the river was higher than the adjacent territory. There was no truth in the story; but it took the wings of the morning and flew to the uttermost parts of the earth.

WORK ON THE TRINITY.

How very many people have heard it, and how very few people ever read the book or heard of the abbé. So with the Trinity River. Dallas, Tex., is on this river, a few miles above its confluence with the East Fork. There has rarely been a situation where a competing water route to the sea was more clearly indicated, as the doctors say, than at Dallas. In the center of the greatest cotton belt in the world, it was actually being strangled by the railroads. It was proposed to improve the Trinity; but then the question was raised whether there was sufficient water in the short stretch down to the point where the two forks united to maintain the required depth if a lock and dam were put there.

In an unhappy moment an engineer suggested that if there were any doubts on this point artesian wells could be sunk to supply the deficiency. How that tale spread and how it has grown and waxed fat as repetition as well as distance lent enchantment. It has been repeated in infinite variations until there are but few who have not heard at least one version of it.

The very matter-of-fact business men of Dallas were confronted with the condition, while the theory was cutting its fantastic tricks as clever paragraphers about the country gave it additions and much currency. Everybody smiled when the Trinity was mentioned; and so these self-same business men went down into their pockets and dug up some $66,000 wherewith to construct a lock and dam to demonstrate that there was ample water in this short section of the river. This they did to everybody's satisfaction, and Congress thereupon adopted the project. It was understood from the very outset that no commerce could develop until the series of locks and dams were completed to the Gulf. There was nothing stranger in this than that there would be no commerce at Panama until the canal was completed. In a few years the improvement of the Trinity will be completed and this greatest cotton-producing section of the world will then be enabled to use it. Until that good day comes, however, it must serve our orators and editors as an illustration of the wicked waste involved in the annual pork barrel, where money is spent on a stream that bears no commerce.

The Brazos has to run this same gantlet until its progressing improvement brings Waco in touch with the Gulf of Mexico.

These are the bright particular spots that illumine every article on the "pork barrel," and they are the horrible examples pointed to by the orators who fight this same devil—that is, by those who happen to know these projects are being provided for. As a rule, of course, your political orator does not labor under the handicap of accurate information.

The climax of pork-barrel orations and editorials usually—almost invariably—finds its fitting cap in the waste of the people's money on ridiculous creeks. How I have heard the changes rung on these worthless creeks!

A party of Congressmen were riding round Boston Harbor some years ago. We were being shown the shipping and the wonderful facilities of that great port by one of the jolliest and cleverest sons of the Old Bay State. We passed a curious old hulk lying in a rather neglected nook of the harbor, when our guide pointed it out as the old Constitution, and really grew eloquent in his recount of its heroic achievements. We were charmed.

Then another less imaginative Bostonian broke in to explain that this was all a mistake. So far from being the Constitution, it was nothing more than an unworthy barge converted into a houseboat. Turning on this iconoclast, our host shouted:

"Well, I knew that all along; but it was serving the purpose most excellent well, and now you have converted this delightful surprise into the biggest disappointment of the morning—and that, too, simply for the sake of uninteresting truth."

THE TONNAGE OF THE CREEKS.

If it were not for the fact that it would be doing ill service to the cause of waterway improvement by poisoning the public conscience with palatable though thoroughly unwholesome fallacies, I would not break this insignificant-creek idol; but I must. Let us, therefore, consider some dry though very pertinent facts.

During the past four years Congress has passed four rivers and harbors appropriation bills. The total carried in those four bills for the improvement of creeks, all told, was $901,000. These same bills carried, for all rivers and all harbors, something more than $100,000,000. Of this sum the creeks got something less than 1 per cent. During those same four years those same creeks, counting all, floated in commerce among our people a tonnage officially valued at $1,000,000,000.

The Ohio River runs for a thousand miles through one of the busiest valleys of this turbulent earth. We are now hurrying to completion a project there for a 9-foot depth from Pittsburgh to the Mississippi River, where it will connect with another 9-foot channel out to the Gulf. We are going to spend on this Ohio River project $63,000,000, and everybody applauds the enterprise, as everybody must. The tonnage of the Ohio River is about 10,000,000 annually.

Those creeks, which cost us less than $1,000,000 in four years, bear an annual commerce of nearly 7,000,000 tons. How many railroads are there in these United States that can carry a billion dollars of commerce with a trackage-maintenance charge of $901,000? Our maintenance charges at Panama, military included, are going to be some twenty-five or thirty million dollars annually.

Is there any poet now in captivity who expects to see $30,000,000,000 of commerce pass through the Panama Canal annually? If it does not, then the creeks will show better in the comparison.

We are all gratified at the commerce on the Great Lakes. It amounted last year to 78,000,000 tons. We have spent something less than $50,000,000 in their improvement and maintenance to date. Four-fifths of the commerce of the Lakes is ore and coal. Expressed in tons of ore this billion dollars of commerce floated on our creeks during the past four years would load 55,000 ore ships of 6,000 tons' burden each. If these could set out on the ocean in line, three ships to the mile—and the law will not permit them to travel that close together—we should have a line of loaded ships from Boston through the Panama Canal and across the Pacific Ocean to Hongkong.

If this ore were loaded on cars carrying 30 tons each, it would fill 11,000,000 cars and require 370,000 locomotives to pull them. Putting the trains 1 mile apart—less distance would be dangerous—they would cover every mile of track in the United States and have enough trains left over to encircle the world four times, a double track round the world at the Equator, and another double track round the world passing through the North and South Poles on the way.

If one is at all interested in the development of our transportation facilities, the next time he meets one of these much-maligned creeks he should take his hat off to it.

This is what the inside of the pork barrel looks like.

Senator BURTON'S criticism was not confined to the items of the bill. No man understands all the phases of waterway improvement better than he. That Congress has invested many dollars in waterway projects which have not returned the service hoped for and expected is most certainly true. That the future will demonstrate we are to-day no better prophets in such matters than our predecessors may well be granted. No project was ever more ardently advocated both in and out of Congress than the old Hennepin Canal.

HOW THE MONEY IS SPENT.

Representatives, and maybe some Senators as well, came in on the flow as their predecessors went out on the ebb of the tide of popular clamor for the construction of this once far-famed canal. It was the most paramount of all the paramount issues in a number of districts of the Middle West. It serves to-day as the horrible example.

"But yesterday the word of Cæsar might
Have stood against the world; now lies he there,
And none so poor to do him reverence."

Mr. BURTON'S criticism went to the method of appropriating rather than to the items for which the appropriations were made. I should say, perhaps, his shafts were better aimed at the method than at the items.

In the days of his chairmanship, rivers and harbors bills were passed only every two or three years. A cash appropriation would be made and then authority given the Secretary of War to enter into contracts for continuing the improvement for several years ahead, to be paid for by the Committee on Appropriations from time to time as the work progressed.

Great pressure was brought on Congress to have an annual rivers and harbors bill just as we have annual bills for the Army, the Navy, and so on. This plan became so popular, in fact, and for obvious reasons, that the committee could not resist either the clamor or the arguments in its favor. Mr. ALEXANDER therefore determined to try it. Until it could be tested by actual practice and experience no man could foretell with certainty its success or failure as an economic policy. There were no prophets to read the future—none, at any rate, who could show any divine commission; so the policy was looked on as an experiment.

If it was to be attempted, every consideration of wisdom and expediency required that the test be fair and complete. Interpreted in the light of this purpose, the conclusion was irresistible that the annual bill should carry no authorization for continuing contracts. Cash sufficient to carry on the work for one year only made it certain that the next year's bill would pass. In this way alone could a fair trial be had.

Four annual bills have since been passed, and the fifth is on the House calendar to-day ready for action. The policy is now as completely fixed as a part of the legislative program as the policy of any other annual appropriation bill. Several lessons have been learned.

Under the plan universally followed by Congress no river or harbor improvement is ever undertaken until it has first been investigated by the engineers of the Army and recommended by them as desirable, cost and commerce both considered. Before the annual-bill policy was adopted it therefore frequently happened that a bill providing for a survey would remain on the committee's calendar for three years; and after the survey was ordered another three years would intervene before the report of the engineers could be acted on.

This country is growing at a very rapid pace. Six years is a long time to wait; so it can be asserted with assurance that the annual bill, in obviating this needless and costly delay, has justified itself.

This, however, is not the whole story. Mr. BURTON thought the continuing-contract system was the economical way to do the work, and time and experience have abundantly justified his theory. When a project has been adopted that will require 5 or even 10 years to complete—the 9-foot project for the Ohio River, for illustration—the businesslike course is to ascertain just how rapidly the work can most economically progress, and then authorize the engineers to proceed.

One Congress can not bind its successor, and there can be no guaranty that funds will be provided next year if the matter be left entirely to the determination of a future Congress. Contractors hesitate to invest in the necessary plant if work for only one year is absolutely assured, and but one method of assurance is possible, and that is to give authority by statute to the Secretary of War to enter into binding contracts.

THE SHIBBOLETH OF ECONOMY.

Experience is the best of all schools, and Congress now has taken the course prescribed. We have learned the lesson and must either return to that system or be convicted of wasteful negligence. The policy of annual bills has been thoroughly justified for the reasons above referred to, though not amplified, and should and will continue; but if just criticism and even censure are to be avoided, those projects which can be most economically prosecuted under authority to make contracts for work or materials for several years ahead must be so undertaken.

Congress is always sensitive—supersensitive, in fact. Members must return to their constituents every two years for judgment. The cry of economy and the charge of extravagance are always the shibboleths of the opposition.

The temptation, then, is indeed great to adhere to the policy of making allowance only for one year's work, though conscious all the while that by so doing the cost of the completed project will be increased. This is the real measure of the service rendered to the taxpayers of the country by those whose zeal for economy focuses their mental vision on the total, let the items be what they may.

If constituencies can be satisfied by assurance that the year's budget is no larger than its predecessor, the election returns will give no cause for complaint, and the professional economist can continue his wasteful practices while the happy taxpayer foots the bills.

Every thoughtful citizen understands and confidently expects that the growing needs of this developing country will be reflected in increasing demands on the Public Treasury. What it is their right to demand and duty to require is that no project for the improvement of any waterway be undertaken by Congress that can not reasonably be expected to promote the general welfare. When such a project is adopted it is the part of statesmanship, as it is the duty of patriotism, to provide for its completion in such manner and in such reasonable time as will effect the result at the minimum cost.

If this rule be faithfully followed, the criticism of those who speak without knowledge and the censure of those who scold without reason may well be disregarded.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 27, 1914:

S. 4096. An act to amend the act authorizing the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes.

On May 28, 1914:

S. 4632. An act for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold, Cheyenne River, Standing Rock, Rosebud, and Pine Ridge Indian Reservations, in the States of North and South Dakota.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business, being the Panama Canal tolls bill, be laid before the Senate for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, on the 7th of August, 1912, when the Panama Canal bill was before the Senate, I was one of the eleven Senators who voted to strike from the bill the provision for exempting vessels engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade of the United States from the payment of tolls. I did so because it then seemed to me that the exemption of our vessels was in contravention of the obligations imposed on our country by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901. As to the economic policy involved in such exemption I never was in doubt, and if the question had been free from the complications involved in the treaty I would, without hesitation, have cast my vote in favor of exemption; but I am one of those who believe that men and nations should live up to their contracts under all circumstances and at whatever cost, and I voted as I did because it then seemed to me that the treaty imposed on us the obligation of charging our own vessels the same tolls as we proposed to charge those flying other flags. I will frankly confess that I have changed my mind on this proposition. In doing this I have followed an illustrious example. In August, 1912, immediately after the enactment of the legislation which he now asks us to repeal, the distinguished gentleman who is now President of the United States gave that legislation his approval in these words:

> One of the bills passed yesterday by the Senate, as it had passed the House, provides for free tolls for American ships through the canal. * * *
> We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. Everything that is done in the interest of free transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men. So that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways. Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines, and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not.

The platform upon which the President was nominated contained the following plank:

> We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in the coastwise trade in passing through the Panama Canal.

The President's acceptance of this plank was distinct and unequivocal. So that as late as the summer and fall of 1912 Mr. Wilson was unquestionably favorable to this exemption, and yet on the 5th of March last he addressed Congress in the following words:

> I have come to ask you for the repeal of that provision of the Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, which exempts vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States from payment of tolls, and to urge upon you the justice, the wisdom, and the large policy of such a repeal with the utmost earnestness of which I am capable.

I have as much right to change my mind as the President of the United States has to change his. In fact, I think that my right in that respect is even greater than his, because my responsibility is less. When I undergo a change of mind it is only my own opinion that is being altered, while, as must be evident to everybody who has observed the course of events during the past few months, a change of mind on the part of the President involves a shifting of opinion on the part of a great majority of those who represent his party in both Houses of Congress. No one for an instant believes that this legislation could receive the support which is now being given it on the other side of the Chamber if it were not for the insistence of the masterful and all-compelling man who moves the minds of his followers from place to place like the figures on a chessboard.

As I stated before, I voted against exemption because it then seemed to me that it was in violation of our treaty obligations. Upon a more careful study of the treaty and of the circumstances which led to its adoption, and of the radical differences between it and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which it superseded, as well as an earnest consideration of matters which have come to light since the enactment of the legislation which it is now proposed to repeal, I am convinced that the exemption of our shipping, coastwise or otherwise, from the payment of tolls, is in no way an infraction of the treaty. Not only this, but, notwithstanding the protests of the British Government, I do not believe that, so far as coastwise shipping is concerned, that Government in reality entertains the view that it is such an infraction. The President says "whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside of the United States." I must take issue with this statement. Our right to exempt our coastwise shipping has been officially conceded outside of the United States, even by the British Government. On the 8th of July, 1912, just before the passage of the Panama Canal bill, Mr. A. Mitchell Innes, chargé d'affaires of the British Embassy at Washington, addressed a note to Secretary Knox, in which he used this language:

> As to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, a more difficult question arises. If the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic which is reserved for United States vessels would be benefited by this exemption, it may be that no objection could be taken.

He then follows it by saying:

> But it appears to my Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting, in fact, in a preference to United States shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

At the time when the canal bill was passed, in August, 1912, this note of Mr. Innes was all that our Government knew concerning the sentiment of the British Government on this subject. At that time we had not heard of the doctrine, which has since been advanced, that the neutrality of the canal meant equality with its owner. No argument or reason of any kind had then been advanced showing or tending to show that we had parted with the right to regulate our own commerce between the different ports of our own country in our own way. The utmost suggestion contained in Mr. Innes's note with reference to our coastwise vessels was that it might be difficult to enforce a law exempting them from payment of tolls. He in effect concedes our right to make such a law. Now, this right being conceded, the suggestion seems presumptuous and preposterous that the United States, having enacted such a law, could not or would not in good faith provide against its infraction or evasion.

The protest of the British Government was not received by our Secretary of State until the 9th of December, 1912, and then for the first time Great Britain disclosed the strength and weakness of her demand, and set out in detail the reasons upon which it was founded and the arguments in support of such reasons. There is a sharp distinction between what we did in 1912 and what we are now called upon to do. We were then merely considering an economic question of a purely domestic nature, the answer to which could in no way affect our dominion over the canal or our power to encourage the upbuilding of our domestic commerce. Now our action involves the acceptance or rejection of a demand to surrender for all time attributes of sovereignty and rights of ownership, the full import and consequence of which upon our peace and prosperity it is impossible to foresee.

In the note of Mr. Innes, which antedated the passage of the canal act, he mentions the fact that it was proposed to exempt not simply the coastwise shipping but all American shipping from the payment of tolls, and he stated that this would, in the opinion of His Majesty's Government, be an infraction of the treaty. When the canal act was signed by President Taft, he thought it wise to take cognizance of this suggestion, and in a memorandum accompanying his approval he repudiated the claim that we could not exempt our vessels engaged in foreign as well as domestic commerce if we elected so to do. The statement of President Taft in this respect is lucid and convincing, but the act contained no such exemption and only exempted coastwise vessels, and this right the British Government had admitted. Here the business should have ended; but the forces behind the British foreign office were insistent, and as a result of this insistence, on the 9th of December, 1912, there was handed to Secretary Knox a lengthy statement by Sir Edward Grey, the purpose of which was to advance an argument why the United States could not exempt its coastwise vessels using the canal, a right which was admitted in the first protest and a thing which the United States had already done. The chief argument in this statement was that in computing tolls, in order to insure that equal treatment which the treaty called for, all vessels using the canal should be taken into consideration, and that to grant an exemption to our coastwise vessels would be to increase the tolls on British ships over and above what they would have to pay if no such exemption were made.

Now, this is all there was to the British case at that time, and all there is in the protest beyond this claim is argument put forth to establish the proposition that the treaty gives Great Britain that equality with us which makes our refusal to consider all vessels in computing tolls a violation of British rights. The answer to this complaint was obvious. President Taft in fixing the tolls to be paid had taken into consideration all the vessels of every nation, our own included, which it was expected would pass through the canal, and Secretary Knox lost no time and wasted no energy in discussing reasons why we should fix the tolls upon a formula which we had already adopted.

After first informing Great Britain that we did not agree with the construction placed by the British Government upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as set out in the communication, and that we did not deem it necessary at that time to amplify or reiterate the American position upon the construction of those treaties, the Secretary proceeded to point out that the complaint had no basis of fact. He directed attention to the fact, which I have already referred to, that the President in fixing the rate on the basis of $1.20 per net ton took into consideration all vessels of every description under any flag which will use the canal; that the proclamation of the President fixing the tolls is based upon a report by Prof. Johnson, which estimates that the revenue necessary to maintain the canal will be $19,000,000; that the report took as a basis all competitive vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, United States vessels engaged in foreign commerce, and foreign vessels of a like description, and that upon this just and equitable basis the tolls were fixed. Moreover, British attention was directed to the fact that this revenue would not be sufficient to maintain the canal—at least for the first few years—and that by this basis for tolls the United States Government bears whatever loss is necessitated by taking into consideration the tolls of even nonpaying vessels. The tolls were therefore fixed on a basis fully in agreement with the suggestions of the British Government, and the chief contention of Sir Edward Grey falls to the ground.

Here again was a place where this controversy should have ceased, and so far as anyone seems to know the information to Great Britain in Mr. Knox's answer to Sir Edward Grey was accepted at its face value. The ground of the British protest had been swept away and our canal act stood unimpeached. Great Britain had mistakenly assumed that our tolls at Panama would be fixed without reference to the use of the canal by American coasting vessels, and based her argument of treaty violation on that mistaken assumption, and asked us to arbitrate on the soundness of her position. We showed her that we had taken the same position and that the tolls were fixed in exact conformity to her own contention. What more was there, then, to the case? Nothing, until we are now urged to repeal the act on the ground that the arguments were sound as advanced by Great Britain to maintain a demand which we had already granted by anticipation.

The present issue as presented to us by the President is: Shall we repeal the law that does Great Britain no harm for the reasons assigned by Great Britain when she mistakenly supposed it did her an injury? That is to say, has Great Britain the equality with the United States under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which she claimed when she supposed that equality was infringed?

The real purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to settle the privileges other nations should enjoy in the use of the canal which the United States had determined to build. It required no treaty to settle the owner's privileges or rights—they are incident to ownership.

Note the language of the treaty. The rules for the government of the canal are not the joint rules of the two contracting parties, but are adopted by the United States in order to prescribe the terms under which the canal could be used by such nations as would observe the rules. It required no rules to establish the owner's right to use its own canal, and what shall be the terms of such use is a matter solely for domestic legislation.

The effort to take advantage of the general language of rule 1, extending the use of our canal to all nations upon equal terms, and to construe them in utter disregard of our different relation to the subject, constitutes a plausible but unsound argument upon which, to the credit of Great Britain, it is only fair to say, she does not rely. Sir Edward Grey does not find the terms of limitation wholly in rule 1. He predicates his claim that we are limited in our freedom of action in respect to the canal by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty upon the ground that, as he claims, the neutrality which we established by that treaty means equality, and that equality between the United States and Great Britain is the same equality that was stipulated in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty can only be read intelligently when the purposes designed to be accomplished and the means of their accomplishment are steadily kept in mind. The purposes were to establish a common policy of the two nations to require of a canal to be built by outside parties that it should be neutral territory—that both countries should enjoy it upon the same terms—and that this should be accomplished by encouraging such outside party to construct the canal, which they jointly agreed to protect, if such third party would give them as good terms for its use as it gave to any other nation.

In the protest of Sir Edward Grey (see Senate Document No. 11, Sixty-third Congress, page 14) he uses the following language:

> They (the British Government) consider that by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the United States had surrendered the right to construct the canal, and that by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty they recovered that right upon the footing that the canal should be open to British and United States vessels upon terms of equal treatment.

This assertion takes no account of the essential purposes of the treaties and the changed circumstances under which the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was effected.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty says:

> In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

From this it will be seen—and it seems to me that it ought to be accepted without question—that the consideration for equal terms rested solely upon the protection to be granted by the two nations to the canal. On no other condition were equal terms to be granted to the subjects of Great Britain and the citizens of the United States. Sir Edward Grey attempts to fuse this with the "general principle" of neutralization referred to in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to which it has no relation whatever.

The "general principle" referred to in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is, by the language of the treaty itself, the "general principle" of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Now, the "general principle" of this article of the latter treaty is the principle of protection, and protection alone; that is, that all countries protecting the canal shall enjoy an equality of treatment in the use of the canal, with the provision that if at any time the treatment becomes unequal the nation discriminated against shall thereafter be relieved from the duty of protection. In other words, equality of treatment was predicated and dependent upon protection. This article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and all other treaty articles dealing with the question, show beyond doubt, first, that the powers extending protection to the canal should enjoy preferential treatment in the use of the canal, and, secondly, that protection of the canal and equality of treatment were mutually interdependent conditions; that protection was to be extended only so long as the treatment was equal, and that the only remedy of such nations in case of unequal treatment was to withdraw their protection. Protection and equal treatment went hand in hand; were mutually interdependent.

The first Hay-Pauncefote treaty incorporated this "general principle" by providing for joint protection of the canal by the United States and Great Britain, and for an equality of treatment and management of the canal as between them. The two things, protection and equality, were in this treaty mutually interdependent, as they were in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but the Senate refused its advice and consent to this treaty and sent it back to the President so modified as to relieve England from any duty or responsibility to protect, all such duty and responsibility being put upon the United States, and also so modified as to reserve to the United States the whole right to regulate the canal. Great Britain declined to accede to these modifications and the treaty fell; but all the principles involved in the modifications were incorporated in the treaty of 1901, which is now existent. Therefore England, no longer bound to protect the canal—the sole and only consideration upon which a demand for equality of treatment could be based—lost the only right she possessed to demand equality of treatment with the protecting power, the United States. As a consequence, the demand for equality of treatment now made stands without any equivalent from her. No longer bound to protect, she is no longer entitled to the same treatment which is extended to the protecting nation, and by the very "general principle" which she invokes, protecting nations stand upon a different and preferential basis as to equality of treatment from all the rest of the world.

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the only treaty which is now in force, appears to me to adequately carry out the "general principle" of neutrality, which was not to be impaired, and also comprehends the spirit of that principle. If absolute rights of ownership and control, and therefore freedom to deal with its own commerce in the use of the canal as it sees fit, are not recognized and conferred by article 2 of that treaty, then it is verily a source of wonder what the language does mean. I will read it:

ART. 2. It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscriptions to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal. (S. Doc. 456, 63d Cong., 2d sess., p. 21.)

With respect to the value of the consideration given Great Britain for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, Sir Edward Grey refers to the account of the negotiations preceding the ratification by the United States Senate of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which Secretary Hay sent to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations. (See Senate Document No. 456, Sixty-third Congress, second session.) Since the British Government, by that reference, recognizes the credibility and authority of this document, I feel warranted in referring to it in answering their contention. In that document Secretary Hay says:

The whole theory of the treaty is that the canal is to be an entirely American canal. The enormous cost of constructing it is to be borne by the United States alone. When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it. Under these circumstances, and considering that now by the new treaty Great Britain is relieved of all the responsibility and burden of maintaining its neutrality and security, it is thought entirely fair to omit the prohibition that "no fortification shall be erected commanding the canal or waters adjacent."

Further along in the same document it is stated:

Upon a full exchange of views this article proposed by the United States was accepted by Great Britain and becomes article 4 of the treaty now submitted. It is thought to do entire justice to the reasonable demands of Great Britain in preserving the general principle of neutralization and at the same time to relieve the United States of the vague, indefinite and embarrassing obligations imposed by the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The clear purport of these statements is that the British Government, in agreeing to the supercession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, had in view as a consideration the relief it would have from the obligation to protect the neutrality and security of the canal. This view is abundantly substantiated in a memorandum inclosed in a dispatch from Lord Lansdowne to Mr. Lowther, under date of August 3, 1901 (see Senate Document No. 456, Sixty-third Congress, second session, page 50), which says:

It is also to be borne in mind that owing to the omission of the words under which the country became jointly bound to defend the neutrality of the canal, and the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the obligations of Great Britain would be materially diminished. This is a most important consideration.

It can thus be seen that Great Britain in consenting to any modification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not unmindful of the obligations imposed upon her by that treaty, and of the relief which such modification would bring from the obligation of protecting and defending the canal and of guaranteeing its neutrality. But it seems to me that there was another and more compelling reason why the Government of Great Britain should not only be willing but anxious to accede to any terms which the United States might propose, and that is the advantage which would inevitably accrue to that country from the very construction of the canal. Great Britain is the greatest shipowner in the world. Her flag flies on every sea. According to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, the steam mercantile marine of Great Britain on the 1st of July last consisted of 10,009 vessels, with a total gross tonnage of 19,849,167 tons. This is more than equal to the combined mercantile marines of the United States, Germany, France, Italy, Japan, Russia, the Netherlands, Norway, and Sweden. These countries together own 10,523 vessels, and their combined capacity is only 16,173,936 tons. The canal will, of course, facilitate and stimulate ocean navigation, and as a consequence of her enormous preponderance as a shipowner Great Britain will naturally reap more benefit from its construction than all the world besides. Her government, therefore, could in no way afford to be a stickler for terms when another government was ready and willing not only to construct the canal but to assume the entire responsibility for its maintenance and protection.

The avowed purpose of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was to facilitate the construction of a ship canal by the United States and to remove any objection which might arise out of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of such a canal under the auspices of the United States without impairing the "general principle of neutralization" established in article 8 of the convention.

Now, note, the object was to facilitate the construction by the United States—not to give the United States permission to construct. How did it facilitate the construction? In one way only. It was the fulfillment of our engagement in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to extend the principle of neutralization to the Panama Canal as we had agreed to do.

The contention of Great Britain is not advanced by the allegation that we secured our right to build the canal by the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The real question is, What rights has Great Britain in our canal under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Great Britain never had any rights in any canal under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. There was no canal. All that the United States and Great Britain agreed to was that if one were constructed by some country other than the United States or Great Britain, or by private parties or a private corporation, the two contracting nations would defend it if they were given equal rights and equal tolls, a policy in which they agreed they would ask all the world to join, which they never did.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, under which the two nations, the United States and Great Britain, jointly agreed to protect a canal to be built by outside parties, is abrogated in express terms. Its place is taken by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, by the terms of which the United States undertakes not only to build but to protect and defend the canal, and as its builder, protector, defender, and owner it adopts rules under which the citizens and subjects of other nations can share the results of its enterprise and expenditure.

Now, let us look at the terms of this treaty. But first I wish to point out the strong line of distinction between the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty on the one hand and the existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty on the other. Article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any state or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any state or government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

The first paragraph of article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900, which was never ratified, reads:

The high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, adopt as the basis of such neutralization the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal; that is to say:

It will be noted that in both of these treaties the two nations stood on terms of exact equality, and Great Britain equally with the United States was a party to the adoption of the rules under which the proposed canal should be operated. Now, compare this with articles 2 and 3 of the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty:

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stocks or shares; and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3, PARAGRAPH 1.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

It will thus be seen that Great Britain in this treaty retires from the position she occupied under both of the others, and that the United States, and the United States alone, adopts and prescribes the rules under which the canal shall be operated. The first of these rules is the chief bone of contention:

RULE 1.

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Now, let us examine this rule, always keeping in mind that it is a rule laid down by the United States, the sole owner of the canal. It says:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality.

I presume it will be conceded that the phrase "vessels of commerce" as applied to any nation means the vessels of commerce belonging to citizens or subjects of that nation and flying its flag, and that the phrase "vessels of war" means the vessels owned by the government itself. "Vessels of commerce and of war" of the United States would therefore mean all vessels flying the flag of the United States. Now, under this rule vessels of war as well as of commerce must pay tolls. That is conceded. On the 19th of November, 1912, following the enactment of the Panama Canal bill, President Taft issued his proclamation prescribing the following rates of toll to be paid by vessels using the canal:

1. On merchant vessels carrying passengers or cargo, $1.20 per net vessel ton—each 100 cubic feet—of actual earning capacity.
2. On vessels in ballast without passengers or cargo, 40 per cent less than the rate of tolls for vessels with passengers or cargo.
3. Upon naval vessels, other than transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships, 50 cents per displacement ton.
4. Upon army and navy transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships, $1.20 per net ton, the vessels to be measured by the same rules as are employed in determining the net tonnage of merchant vessels.

It will here be seen that all vessels, both of commerce and of war, must pay tolls. None are excluded. If, then, the phrase "all nations observing these rules," as contained in rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, includes the United States, the grantor, it must necessarily follow that the naval vessels of the United States, and the army and navy transports, colliers, hospital ships, and supply ships owned by it, must be charged tolls as well as like ships of other nations. Now, this is a construction which nobody places upon this rule. Everybody concedes that the naval vessels of the United States can pass free, or, at least, that the United States has the power to allow them free passage without being charged with a violation of the treaty. How, then, can we escape the conclusion that this power or this rule carries with it the right to exempt its ships of commerce as well? There can be no other conclusion.

Now, let us suppose that two battleships appear in the harbor of Colon at the same time, bound for the Pacific. One belongs to the United States Navy, the other to Great Britain. They pass through the canal on the same day. The British ship pays toll at the rate of 50 cents per displacement ton; that of the United States pays nothing. Neither Great Britain nor the advocates of repeal, nor any other person, will contend that this is an infraction of rule 1. Why construe the rule one way as to warships and another as to merchant vessels? The language of the treaty is precisely the same with regard to both—

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality.

But let us go a little further in the examination of this treaty. In addition to rule 1, which is the main subject of contention, it lays down five other rules under which the canal shall be used. Not one of these five can by any possibility be held to apply to the United States as a user of the canal.

The second rule provides that—

The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

It surely can not be contended that this rule is in any way intended to apply to the United States, for it stands to reason that no country would ever under any circumstances institute a blockade of its own canal, and its right to fortify and to protect it is conceded by everybody. This rule is laid down by the United States as one of the conditions under which other nations shall be allowed to use its canal.

Third. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal, except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

If these rules are intended to govern the United States as well as other nations, it would prevent our Government from using the canal as a harbor of refuge in case of war with any other power, and such use is in reality the chief reason why this Government incurred the enormous expense involved in building and assumes the great responsibility of maintaining it.

The other rules read as follows:

Fourth. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

Fifth. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible, but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

Sixth. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty and in time of war as in time of peace shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

If these rules are to control the United States as well as other nations, we could not maintain any depot of supplies on the canal; we could not revictual our ships or maintain a coaling station; or, in fact, use the canal or the canal territory for any other purposes of war. Why, then, may I ask, did we build it? It is not necessary to go into any lengthy discussion of this proposition, for nobody contends that the United States is in any way bound by the last five of the treaty rules. Why, then, contend that it is bound by rule 1? To use the concise and convincing words of Mr. Olney:

When five out of six of the treaty rules for the use of the canal do not apply to the United States it is a reasonable conclusion that the sixth also was not meant to apply.

Mr. President, it seems to me that a careful consideration of the subject leads inevitably to the conclusion that the canal is the property of the United States, built across her own territory by her own sons with her own money; that she can handle and manage this property of hers in any manner that seems best to her, subject only to the limitations she has placed upon herself in the treaties with Great Britain and the Republic of Panama; that the exemption of her own shipping from the payment of tolls is in no way a violation of either of those treaties, especially in view of the fact that the tolls which we propose to charge to vessels of other nations are so low that if we add to the revenues derived from them the amounts we would receive if we charged tolls for our own shipping the total sum would be several million dollars short of the amount necessary to operate the canal, to say nothing of a return on the investment.

Now, a few words as to the policy of doing this. In the years that are past the United States has spent many millions upon her waterways and her harbors. Not a dollar of tolls is charged upon any of them. Why should we make an exception of this, the greatest and most important of all? Senators upon the other side say it is a subsidy. Subsidy is a great scare word for our Democratic friends, but only when it is coupled with the word "ship." Other subsidies do not frighten them. If the subsidy takes the shape of an appropriation of $678,240 for the extermination of the cotton-boll weevil, or of $400,000 for the eradication of the southern cattle tick, or of any other of the multiform ways of spending Government money, of which latter-day statesmen are so fond, they do not run away from it. I will frankly say that I am not afraid of subsidies, called even by that opprobrious name and applied to American shipping. If Congress would spend for the encouragement of American shipping a tithe of the money it annually wastes in subsidizing certain favored localities and classes, the country would fare infinitely better. I wonder if we realize the tribute we are yearly paying to other countries for carrying our foreign commerce. For the fiscal year of 1913 the total value of our exports and imports was $3,773,030,864. Of this we carried in our own ships only $381,032,495, or almost exactly the same value as we carried away back in the year 1861. In 1861 we carried 65.2 per cent of our foreign commerce in our own bottoms. In 1913 we carried just 11.2 per cent. The amount of toll we pay to the people of other nations, and particularly to Great Britain, for carrying our foreign commerce is almost beyond computation, and a comparatively small sum paid annually for the encouragement of American shipping would return us twenty, sixty, or a hundred fold.

If this toll exemption is a subsidy, then practically every appropriation we make, except for actual running expenses, can be called by that name.

For nearly 50 years a private corporation maintained a series of locks and dams upon the Monongahela River in my State. This company charged tolls upon every vessel passing up and down the river. The tonnage was, and still is, very great, consisting largely of coal, and the company reaped large profits. About 20 years ago the Government bought out this company and freed the commerce of the river, relieving the coal-mining industry of what had been rather a heavy burden. Now, in doing this the Government subsidized somebody. If the freeing of the river from tolls reduced the price of coal, the steel manufacturers and the people down the Ohio and Mississippi who used it were subsidized. If, as I believe, it made little or no impression upon the price, the coal operators were the direct beneficiaries of the subsidy.

The Agricultural bill, which passed the Senate last week, carried an appropriation of $50,000 to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned or with individuals, to make investigations and demonstrations in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States. The Senate, in its wisdom and liberality, voted by a majority of two to one to increase this appropriation to $100,000. What else is this but a subsidy intended, I presume, to reconcile the heretofore sugar growers of Louisiana to the cruel stab they received in the house of their friends by the enactment of the tariff bill? This exemption of tolls, Mr. President, is no more—in fact, it is even less—of a subsidy than this and many other grants like those I have referred to which pass Congress almost daily. It surely is no more of a subsidy to-day than it was on the 7th of August, 1912, when every Democrat in the Senate voted in its favor.

I believe that under the treaty we have this right. I believe we have it not only as applied to our coastwise shipping, but to that engaged in foreign trade. I believe that the right ought to be exercised, for I do not think that so far as the ships flying our flag are concerned they should be subjected to any other rule than that which governs our other waterways. I will therefore vote against the repeal. I will go further—I will vote for any proposition which seeks to amend the existing law so as to exempt our foreign as well as our coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls. At the same time, Mr. President, I realize that the subject is not free from controversy. I have been deeply impressed with the arguments presented by Senators who have so ably spoken on the other side of the question. If by our treaty we have precluded ourselves from passing our own ships free through the canal, which I do not believe, we ought to stand by our bargain. Inasmuch as the Government of Great Britain, which in the note of Mr. Innes conceded our right to exempt our own shipping, now insists on another interpretation of the treaty, and as this view is taken by many of our own people, I think it is a fair case for arbitration, and I will vote for any amendment which provides for submitting the question to any impartial tribunal. I firmly believe that any such tribunal will decide that the United States has a full right to do as she pleases with her own. If the judgment is otherwise, we should abide by it.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, to those who have not given the subject special attention it might seem, at the first blush, that, despite the differences of opinion, the proposed repeal of the exemption from the payment of tolls of our vessels engaged in coastwise trade is not a complex proposition. As a matter of fact, however, the whole question is a very intricate one, involving a number of highly important considerations, including the controversy between the British Government and our own in regard to the proper interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Under date of the 8th of July, 1912, prior to the passage of the Panama Canal act on the 24th of the following month, which exempted our coastwise trade from tolls, the British Government made a general protest against any exemption from tolls in favor of American shipping passing through the canal, followed, November 14, 1912, by a much fuller note on the same subject, special exception being taken to the Panama Canal act as an infraction of the treaty. This note stated that the British Government—recognizes that many persons of note in the United States, whose opinions are entitled to great weight, hold that the provisions of the act do not infringe the conventional obligations by which the United States is bound, and under these circumstances they desire to state their perfect readiness to submit the question to arbitration if the Government of the United States would prefer to take this course—a reference to arbitration would be rendered unnecessary if the Government of the United States should be prepared to take such steps as would remove the objections to the act which His Majesty's Government have stated.

The steps referred to being, apparently, the repeal of the Panama Canal act.

In its reply to the preceding notes, on the 17th of January, 1913, Mr. Knox, our Secretary of State, after dissenting from the interpretation placed upon the treaty by the British Government, expressed the opinion that arbitration would not be in order until the completion of the Panama Canal, as the provisions of the treaty in regard to its use would not become operative until the canal was opened; and added that the arbitration proposal might be carried out either under special agreement or under a proposed arbitration treaty which was being negotiated between the two powers.

This was followed by another note from the British Government, dated February 27, 1913, suggesting that—the difference which exists between the two Governments is clearly one which falls within the meaning of article 1 of the arbitration treaty of 1908—interest of both countries requires that issue to be settled promptly before the opening of the canal, and by means which will leave no ground for regret or complaint. The avoidance of possible friction has been one of the main objects of those methods of arbitration of which the United States has been for so long a foremost and consistent advocate.

And that the—

Mr. President, the various questions involved in the discussion of the pending bill may be summed up under three heads:

First. As to whether the coastwise exemption provided for in the Panama act was in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, as asserted by the British Government and by President Wilson.

Second. As to the economic questions involved in the repeal of the coastwise exemption.

Third. As to the precedents which might thereby be created and as to our moral and patriotic obligations to the people of the United States.

So far as the first head is concerned, I do not propose to trace the diplomatic history of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, nor to discuss the question as to whether the words "all nations" include, or do not include, the United States, this having been done most fully and most ably by others, and I shall merely refer to a few points in connection with the bill which have made a certain impression upon my mind.

Under the third article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States adopted six rules in regard to the neutralization and use of the Panama Canal. The first of these rules reads as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The Panama Canal act of August 24, 1912, declared that vessels engaged in our coastwise trade were exempted from the payment of tolls passing through the canal. It is claimed not only by the British Government, but by the President of the United States and a number of our prominent statesmen and jurists, that this legislation was in contravention of the rule just quoted. On the other hand, many of our distinguished international lawyers and statesmen, including ex-President Taft, ex-Secretary of State Knox, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and numerous others, take a wholly different view, which, it may be observed, has the support of several English authorities as well.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded in 1901, the vessels engaged exclusively in our coastwise trade, or, as it is entitled in the Revised Statutes, our domestic commerce, consisted of those enrolled under our navigation laws and which paid an annual license to the Government. These vessels plied between the different ports of the United States, including, by virtue of special acts of Congress, the ports in Porto Rico, Hawaii, and Alaska, and were at all times, except when on the high seas, in territory under the jurisdiction of the United States. As the Hay-Pauncefote treaty referred to a canal which was to be constructed on the soil of a foreign power, it is a serious question whether the treaty could have referred to our coastwise vessels, inasmuch as such vessels sailing from an Atlantic port to a Pacific port, or the reverse, and which to reach their destination would have had to pass for some 40 miles through the territory of a foreign nation, were evidently differentiated from our vessels engaged in domestic commerce which sailed directly from one port to another port of this country and were never beyond its jurisdiction except when on the high seas.

I never have been able to bring myself to believe, Mr. President, that when the treaty of 1901 was negotiated the British Government had our coastwise vessels specifically in mind. I believe that these vessels were excluded from consideration not only because they were engaged exclusively in our domestic commerce with which British ships could not compete, but because domestic commerce in general, or "cabotage," as it is called in continental Europe, refers exclusively to commerce carried on under domestic jurisdiction. A precisely analogous case, with which the British Government must necessarily have been familiar, is to be found in Europe. The commerce of Russia between its ports on the Baltic Sea and its ports on the Black Sea, which only reaches its destination by passing for many miles through the Dardanelles in Turkish territory, can not be considered as cabotage, or coastwise trade.

The assertion has been made that it was clearly understood between the contracting powers that the above rule did cover specifically our coastwise vessels, and that therefore we are bound in good faith not to discriminate in their favor. Admitting, for the sake of argument, that the above assertion was correct, it could only have referred to the understanding between the British Government and the representatives of the Executive branch of our own Government who conducted the negotiations; but, Mr. President, under the Constitution the President of the United States does not possess the exclusive treaty-making power, but shares it with the Senate. In fairness, therefore, when we consider this point, the intent of the Senate when it ratified the treaty should be taken into account, and it is the practically unanimous testimony of those who were then members of that body that it was the clear and definite understanding of the Senate that the United States had the full right to exempt its coastwise vessels from the imposition of tolls without incurring any imputation of thereby violating the treaty.

Some two years later, the situation was entirely changed when the Republic of Panama ceded to our country a tract of territory extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, known as the Canal Zone, over which the United States enjoys full and complete sovereignty, as is affirmed by a decision of the Supreme Court. Under these conditions it is evident that our coastwise vessels plying between the Atlantic and Pacific and not touching at any foreign ports would be always within American territory except when on the high seas, and that their status, therefore, would be identical with those vessels which sail from one Atlantic port to another, or from one Pacific port to another. It is to be observed that the change of conditions incident to our newly acquired sovereignty was recognized by Great Britain in her second note, which concedes that—

Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

Taking up now, Mr. President, the second branch of my subject—as to the economic questions involved—I will say that I have always been a strong advocate of a wise and well-considered system of subsidies for American commerce, believing this to be the only way in which our almost nonexistent merchant marine can be restored. Two years ago I voted against the conference report on the "act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal," and when the vote was taken on the motion to strike out the clause exempting American coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls, I stated that had I not been paired I would have voted "yea." My action at that time was based on the belief that if subsidies were to be granted to our coastwise shipping it was far wiser and better to grant them directly and openly by refunding their canal tolls than to do so in the indirect way provided for in the act just mentioned, particularly as by the former method we would not have involved ourselves in a controversy as to the observance or nonobservance of our treaty obligations. Had the interests of our coastwise shipping been thus treated, the British Government would have had no valid grounds for objection, as, like all the other great powers, it has always granted subsidies to its own merchant marine, these subsidies being one of the factors which have brought about the practical extinction of our merchant marine.

Now, Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that it is alleged that an exemption from tolls is not a subsidy, and the junior Senator from New York, in his very able speech on the bill now before the Senate, has defined a subsidy as "a gift of public funds from the Government to a private person or corporation to aid in the establishment or support of an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public"; which definition, in my judgment, is far too narrow. A subsidy is defined in Webster's International Dictionary to be "a grant from the Government, from a municipal corporation, or the like, to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public; a subvention"; and a subvention is defined by the same authority to be "the act of relieving, as of a burden; support; aid; assistance; help. A Government aid or bounty." If the definitions of the International Dictionary be accepted, it is evident that a subsidy is not confined to a gift in the shape of money, but to aid, assistance, or help in any form. As instances, we may cite the extensive grants of land made by the Government to our transcontinental railroads and the donations of land or exemptions from local taxation so often made by municipalities to encourage the location of new enterprises within their corporate limits. Going a step further, let us take the case of a river which is of sufficient depth for ordinary vessels of commerce, but which has a bar at its mouth which renders it inaccessible. Now, the Government could make a grant of money to the communities interested for the purpose of enabling them to dredge the bar and make the stream accessible, and it could not be disputed that this would be a subsidy; but should the Government say "No; we will not give the money directly, but will dredge the bar at our own cost and in our own way," it seems to me that such an expenditure of public funds would amount practically to the same thing. In short, Mr. President, to my mind any aid extended for the establishment or support of enterprises deemed advantageous to the public—whether in the form of direct grants of money, land, or other valuable considerations, or by the expenditure of funds to improve our rivers and harbors—is a subsidy, in a direct or indirect form.

Another argument presented in support of the pending bill is based upon the prediction that if the exemption from tolls be retained it would not be of any avail to the general public by the reduction of freight rates, but would simply permit the vessel owners to reap larger profits at the expense of the taxpayers. Economic predictions, Mr. President, when they refer to special and particular cases, are somewhat hazardous. A great many unsound ones have been made in the past. Many years ago it was insisted that the removal of the duty on coffee by the so-called "free breakfast table" act would be of great benefit to the consumer; but the sequel proved that all that ensued was that the Treasury of the United States was the loser without any benefit to the consumer. A similar instance was the forecast made as to the loss to the cattle owners throughout the land when hides were put on the free list, the fact being that after this action was taken the price of hides advanced. Confident and reiterated predictions, as we all know, have been made that the reduction of the tariff would greatly reduce the cost of living, but up to the present moment these have not been fulfilled. All such economic considerations, however, Mr. President, are relatively unimportant, in my judgment, the chief points at issue being whether the exemption from tolls of our coastwise traffic was or was not a violation of the treaty, and as to our responsibilities to the people of this country in any action which may be taken.

Passing now, Mr. President, to the last branch of my subject, in a much more able way than I could have done the junior Senator from Utah has anticipated much of what I had intended to say in regard to the precedent which would be established by the repeal of the exemption. Should the question in dispute be arbitrated in the future, it is very plain, Mr. President, that a repeal of the act exempting our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls would be treated as a confession that in enacting the legislation of August 24, 1912, we had exceeded our rights and powers under the treaty. Should this act be repealed, we will have needlessly sacrificed our liberty of action, and will be compelled to depend upon direct money subsidies if it be found necessary hereafter to help our merchant marine.

Mr. President, the past and especially the present administration has taken such strong ground in regard to the arbitration of all differences which may arise between ourselves and other nations that it was a matter of very great surprise to me that the message of the President of the United States did not recommend that the question in regard to the exemption of tolls should be settled in this way, as proposed by the British Government. I for one would be glad to see it referred for adjustment to a proper tribunal. The question is difficult as well as delicate, and it seems to me that arbitration would be an eminently proper method of bringing about a settlement, but the message, while not making the slightest reference to such a course, simply urges the absolute and unconditional repeal of the exemption of tolls so far as our coastwise vessels are concerned.

In making his recommendation, which involves the legal interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the President thereby absolutely reverses the judgment of the previous administration, which, it is to be observed, was especially equipped for the proper interpretation of questions of this character in view of the eminent legal attainments of the former President and former Secretary of State, both of whom have presented very full and complete arguments in explanation of their conclusions. While not disputing the right of President Wilson to take such action as he may think proper and to ignore the attitude of the previous administration, we may well consider for the moment the grounds upon which he demands the repeal of the act. He states that in his "own judgment," after mature consideration, the act of August 24, 1912, is "in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901," but does not give us the legal reasons upon which his conclusions are based. He next states that his interpretation of the treaty is in accord with that of foreigners in general, and that everywhere, except in the United States, the "language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal." He also refers to the effect of the repeal upon the foreign policy of the administration, but his reference is so vague that it is impossible to draw any specific conclusions. In brief, the message pressingly urges Congress to absolutely reverse the position it took two years ago in regard to the exemption of our coastwise trade from the payment of tolls in deference to public opinion abroad and upon the "judgment" of President Wilson. Further, the message in question is misleading and unsatisfactory, first, because it fails to make any mention of the notes of the British Government asserting that the Panama Canal Act of 1912 violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was the origin of the whole controversy, and, second, because it absolutely ignores the British proposals to settle the matters in dispute by arbitration.

To conclude, Mr. President, I should much prefer to see the differences of opinion in regard to the interpretation of the treaty settled by arbitration, but if this be not possible, after a very careful consideration of the whole question, I feel that I would not be justified in agreeing to unconditionally surrender, as is so strongly urged by President Wilson, any legal or equitable rights which the United States may possess in the premises, nor to take a step which, in my judgment, impinges upon the dignity of our country and upon the self-respect of every American citizen. I shall, therefore, vote against the bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, after so much has been said in the matter of free tolls, touching almost every feature of this great question of such vital and serious consequence to this Nation, I fear I shall not be able to follow other than a beaten track in my efforts to offer anything new, illuminating, or calculated in any way to cause anyone to look at this difficult problem in a light different to that in which it has hitherto been presented. Yet in some respects—not commercial or material in their nature—in my judgment, it is the gravest problem, save one, that has been presented for solution by this Government since the great question that preceded and followed in the wake of the War between the States. How important, then, is it that we should make no mistake in considering well this great question before it is finally determined?

We have a country of wonderful resources, of splendid possibilities in the long line of development that still lies before us, and, in my judgment, of the greatest population-sustaining potentiality of any country on earth of the same territorial extent. It is not worth while in this discussion, as serious as the matter is, not only to this but other civilized nations of the earth, for us to become unduly alarmed, fearing that we will part with some of our sovereign or inalienable rights under the Constitution. When the United States was in its infancy, isolated as it is, no other nation dared to attempt to land on our shores since the treaty of Ghent, nearly a hundred years ago, to invade any portion of our territory.

Now, with a hundred million people, matchless in advancement and civilization, all united in a common cause, with immeasurable resources, the greatest factor in the world to make a nation puissant and all-conquering, why should we fear and tremble lest our rights should be invaded or be unduly filched from us by any power meditating our overthrow?

I fear some of the Senators are resorting to an extreme position in becoming unduly apprehensive for fear we yield our rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to England and other nations using the canal on terms of entire equality. A great Nation like the United States can afford to be broad and liberal in the construction of treaties and treaty rights. If there is even a reasonable doubt as to the proper construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, this Government, with strong argument to support her contention in favor of passing our coastwise vessels through the canal free, should yield in the face of the fact that England and nearly every other civilized nation of the world are considerately opposing our contention for free tolls.

As the question has been so ably argued both for and against free tolls for our coastwise vessels, exhausting every possible source of information, I shall content myself with only a brief argument in my effort to demonstrate that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we have no right to pass our merchant marine plying the seas from the Atlantic to the Pacific coastwise except on terms of entire equality.

When we pass to an economic consideration of this vitally important subject, it is not by any means because I deem the economic side of the question of more serious consequence to the United States or to the interests of the great industrial force of our Nation.

My purpose to leave alone any extended discussion of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or the Clayton-Bulwer convention is because many of the distinguished Senators, with more accurate knowledge of treaties, treaty making, and treaty obligations, have been, it seems to me, convincing in their arguments that the United States were included in "all nations," the vessels of whose citizens were to use this canal on terms of entire equality. The senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], whose argument last week seemed to be so conclusive, was intimately identified with Mr. Hay, our great diplomat and one of the controlling spirits in directing and framing the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and he says that it was their intention, and there was no other understanding with Mr. Choate, Lord Pauncefote, and Lord Lansdowne in all the writings leading up to the signing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, that not only the United States but all other countries observing these rules should use the canal on terms of entire equality.

Mr. Joseph H. Choate, then ambassador to Great Britain from the United States, assisted in the negotiation of the treaty. Mr. Choate—and what he says was vouched for in the very able argument by the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] delivered in this body a few days ago—speaking for Mr. Hay and Lord Pauncefote, whose lips are now sealed in death, says that there was no suggestion at any stage of the negotiations leading up to the signing of this treaty that there should be toll exemption for any nation or any of its citizens or subjects. Not only Mr. Hay, Mr. Root, Mr. Choate, and Mr. Andrew D. White, but Lords Pauncefote and Lansdowne and a host of other distinguished men like Senator Lodge, Senator Burton, Charles W. Eliot, Oscar S. Strauss, George F. Edmunds, Col. George W. Goethals, and others corroborate the men who were actively engaged in the negotiations leading up to the signing of this important treaty.

It seems to me that all this array of indisputable testimony should establish beyond any sort of peradventure that free tolls through the Panama Canal were never contemplated or mentioned by either of the signatories to the treaty. It is true some of the Senators in their arguments in favor of free tolls have advanced quite a number of German authorities in the endeavor to establish their contention. While Germany is noted for her men of erudition and broad scholarship—her great lawyers and publicists—her position, when it comes to passing upon the rights of the British Government, should be considered in connection with the attitude she has sustained toward England for many years.

Both of these great nations would feel easier were they further removed from each other, and it is rather natural that, ancient enemies as they are, Germany does not want England, with her great merchant marine, to occupy any vantage ground, so a jealous, selfish interest may have something to do in shaping the legal diplomatic opinions that emanate from her great writers on treaties and international law.

It hardly seems necessary for me to go into the discussion—any more than to merely mention it—of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with such weight of authority establishing conclusively to my mind its entire equality to all nations—preferring none. Admitting, however, my limited knowledge as to the construction of the treaties and treaty rights, I shall be brief in considering our rights and obligations under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

I ask to have inserted in the RECORD the Hay-Pauncefote treaty at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission to do so is granted.

The treaty referred to is as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord 1901.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]"

Mr. WEST. In transmitting to the President the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, Mr. Hay said:

THE PRESIDENT:

I submit for your consideration and for transmission to the Senate, should you deem it proper to do so, with a view to obtaining the advice and consent of that body to its ratification, a convention signed November 18, 1901, by the respective plenipotentiaries of the United States and Great Britain to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN HAY.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 2, 1901.

Now, in his letter to the President, Mr. Hay said:

Without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

To show the temper of the Senate, when the treaty came up for ratification in that body, Senator Bacon, of Georgia, proposed the following amendments:

In the preamble strike out all after the words "United States," in the tenth line, down to and including the word "convention," in line 11.

Strike out from article 2, in line 10, the following words: "Subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

Strike out all of articles 3 and 4.

The preamble reads as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles.

And the amendments of Senator Bacon proposed to strike out "without impairing the 'general principle' of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention."

Referring to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we find article 8 in that convention, which Senator Bacon was desirous of getting rid of, reads as follows:

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired in entering into this convention to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection by treaty stipulations to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other state which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

If this article meant nothing to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, what object could Senator Bacon have had in moving to strike out the words above referred to in the preamble? The distinguished Senator was too well versed in matters of foreign relations and international law not to know the full force and effect of this clause in the preamble of the present treaty. But let us go a step further in the matter of amendments offered by Senator Bacon. He proposed to strike out in article 11 in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the words "subject to the provisions of the present treaty," and then the article would read:

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

To go still further, the Senator proposed to strike out articles 3 and 4, leaving, as amended, only three articles—1, 2, and 5, in the entire treaty, which would read as follows:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

Now, if the distinguished Senator had succeeded in passing these amendments, only one of which means anything, and that as amended has reference to construction and providing for the regulation and management of the canal by the United States—article 1 merely states that the present treaty supersedes the Clayton-Bulwer convention, and article 5 has reference only to the ratification of the signatory powers—had these amendments been agreed to the opposition to the pending bill might have had good ground for their contention, for the whole matter of construction and regulation of the Panama Canal would have been left to the United States.

But how did the Senate view the amendments offered by Senator Bacon?

They were defeated by a vote of 18 yeas to 60 nays.

Senator McLaurin, of Mississippi, proposed to strike out of article 3 the following:

Substantially as amended in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

And this amendment was likewise disagreed to.

Had the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi prevailed, then the remainder of the paragraph would read as follows:

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules—that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

If this part of the section, "substantially as embodied in this convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of this canal," meant nothing, why was it put into the section? It meant, just as the Suez Canal is operated to-day, that, including England, all nations must be on entire equality. It meant, as the convention of Constantinople included England, so this Hay-Pauncefote treaty includes the United States.

Now, it seems to me the only escape for the United States from the terms of this section is to say that the part England took in making the treaty was merely pro forma, and it was, so construing it, clearly an edict, declaration, propaganda, or pronunciamento, and England was not in anywise considered a party thereto. But how two parties can enter into a compact and one is bound and the other is not is entirely beyond my comprehension.

How you can include the one and exclude the other without in express terms so declaring in the instrument is to my mind the knotty problem.

Besides, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has with the most painstaking diligence and careful research shown that this great Nation in all her treaties has for more than a hundred years placed herself, her citizens, and subjects on entire equality with the other signatory powers. Then, with all the language in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty tending to establish beyond any sort of cavil the entire equality of not only the two signatory powers, but all nations observing the rules, I can not see how anyone can escape the conclusion that the United States are included among "all nations."

As to the acquisition of the belt of land stretching across the Isthmus of Panama, it is made clear in the treaty that it in nowise would change the terms of the convention. In the purchase of this strip of land from Panama, it seems to be clear that the United States were to use it in accordance with the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and should this Government at any time abandon it or convert it to uses other than for canal purposes, it would revert to Panama. In other words, it is my candid judgment that this Government could not, on the terms the purchase was made, establish there a tubercular hospital or a leprotarium, or anything of like character.

Much has been said in the discussion in reference to the Welland and other canals in the Dominion of Canada, and rebates that were allowed to vessels discharging their cargoes in the Canadian ports. This was done, and a rebate of 18 cents out of 20 cents was allowed to all vessels going east to Montreal and points beyond. While the terms of the treaty regulating the traffic upon this canal were not near so clear and definite in meaning, the United States declared it was a patent discrimination against the citizens and subjects of this Government, and that this gross injustice under the treaty stipulation had to cease.

After congressional protests and long diplomatic correspondence the troubles arising out of the discrimination favoring Canadian citizens were settled, yet the Dominion of Canada was unceasing in protesting that she was transgressing no rights under the treaty that belong to citizens of the United States.

She finally yielded to the demands made by this Government, and all discrimination against our citizens ceased.

Some who have taken a position favoring free tolls through the Panama Canal have sought to justify the contention so assumed, because in the face of treaty rights Canada persisted in giving rebates to all vessels going east discharging cargoes at Montreal and points beyond.

Should the transgression of Canada of a treaty and treaty rights, especially after she has ceased to do what is inhibited under the treaty, furnish a pretext years after the wrongdoing for this Government to enter the field with a view of retaliating after the incident is closed and almost forgotten? To pursue such a course would be ill-becoming a great nation; besides we would leave ourselves open to the criticism and animadversion of the civilized nations of the earth. But let not this great Government appear in the rôle of administering retributive justice to such nations as failed in the past to observe their treaty obligations. The United States surely could not justify herself in pursuing such a course.

This is the charitable view of the strong toward the weak, and should be the guiding principle of our Government that has been the foremost among the nations of the earth in advocating universal peace and international brotherhood.

To those who do not think the United States are included in the term "all nations" I desire now as briefly as possible to call their attention to the economic and commercial view of the question, and determine the rights of our citizens from an economic standpoint.

I shall first consider briefly the Suez Canal, that is giving service on terms of entire equality to all nations observing the rules under the convention of Constantinople, October 28, 1888, for the free navigation of this canal. The cutting of this canal at this time by De Lesseps was regarded as a wonderful piece of engineering skill, and cost the stockholders about $127,000,000.

This great water highway that floats the vessels of almost every civilized nation of the globe is 103 miles long, 28 feet deep, and 17 hours are required for vessels to pass through it. This canal is operated under a stock company, and the total number of shares is 379,245.

It is said the British Government owns 176,602 of these shares, and the last dividend declared showed a net income of 31 per cent. The charges per net ton for vessels with cargo were $1.30, and 82 cents per ton for vessels in ballast, and $1.93 for each passenger 12 years of age or over. It can be seen that this is a magnificent property, and if it were owned by shareholders under our Government, being a public-utility corporation, the stockholders would not long draw 31 per cent, for the Government would step in and demand that the charges be reduced.

The Panama Canal before it is ready for service will cost the United States more than three times as much as the Suez Canal cost its stockholders; so, with equal tonnage, which we will not likely have, and the same expense of operating, this Government would have to charge three times as much. But even on a much smaller tonnage estimate, according to the report of traffic experts, the Panama Canal would pass through its locks 10,500,000 net tons, whereas the Suez Canal passed in round numbers 16,582,000. Now, this Government proposes to charge only $1.20 per net registered ton. It takes no financier, when considering the cost of construction and upkeep, to determine that the rates fixed by this Government are extremely reasonable; besides, there is no charge for passengers passing through the canal.

It has even been contended in this Chamber that as we will be unable to pay for maintenance and upkeep ($6,000,000) and the guarding and policing the fortifications ($10,000,000), we should not only allow free tolls to our ships but subsidize the ships of all nations to the extent of the tolls that the United States would collect. As Proctor Knott once said in a notable speech—commonly known as his "Duluth speech"—delivered in the House of Representatives in 1871, where the bill sought that the Government donate large tracts of land to build a railroad to Duluth, that his relation was only a "trustee to an express trust." That is the relation we sustain to this canal, and we have no right, in order to save to our coastwise shipping interests about $1,000,000 annually, to donate about $10,000,000 out of the hard earnings of the masses of the United States to the nations of the world. Yet, as a matter of right, I hope to be able to show that we are not in a much better position when we undertake to extort from all the people in order to give the few in the trade constituting, if I am to believe what has been stated in this Chamber, a great monopoly—a trust, if you please; that more familiar word in legislation and political parlance.

I expect to show that the coastwise trade has in a sense been a legalized subsidy for nearly a hundred years—worse than a subsidy, for, without regulation under the Interstate Commerce Commission, they have charged everything the commodity carried would bear without let or hindrance, or without fear on the high seas of any competition, for no nation on earth save the United States can engage in our coastwise trade, and who can this prohibition hurt, and I ask this question for the benefit of those who have said on this floor it was not for the people engaged in coastwise shipping they were concerned, but for the dear people—the masses who consume these products that were shipped in under free tolls. But I will illustrate with a concrete example and let those contending for free tolls answer my contention.

For the sake of this illustration I will take a coastwise vessel passing from New York to New Orleans, and will say the charges on this vessel are $3 per ton, but if our coastwise shipping was open to all nations the same commodity could be hauled at $2 per ton. Now, according to the arguments made on this floor for free tolls, the people generally would receive in the reduced price this difference of $1 per ton. But the people do not get it, and in a form it is a clear subsidy to our coastwise vessels; and neither would the people get the other subsidy, the $1, I will say for the sake of this argument, allowed for free tolls through the Panama Canal. This, I claim, is worse than a subsidy, for the United States clearly discriminates between coastwise vessels passing through the canal and those not going through. Let me illustrate by taking the vessels sailing under the United States flag and all bound for New Orleans.

One, I will say, is a coastwise vessel from New York, the second a coastwise vessel from San Francisco, and the third a vessel from the Orient flying the American flag.

It is quite clear to the minds of all that the coastwise vessel from San Francisco enjoying free tolls has $1 per ton differential over the vessel flying the American flag from the Orient, and as all vessels passing through the canal except coastwise vessels pay tolls, it necessarily gives the vessel from San Francisco advantage over the New York vessel, for the $1 per ton is a clear subsidy, as no vessel is allowed it except the one from San Francisco. The Government is not only subsidizing coastwise vessels passing through the canal—amounting, as I have already shown, to a double subsidy—but she, in allowing coastwise ships to pass free through the canal, is accomplishing what we have tried to prevent so long, driving ships that float the American flag from the high seas.

I want those who advocate free tolls, and are as a consequence so deeply moved in their efforts to advance the interests of the people suffering for the want of free tolls, to turn their attention to another thing that might really help the people in the United States. The vessels from any land may bring the products of their countries into our ports, and having landed them here, it may be, free, if there be no tariff, they can pass through free on the subsidized vessels. These foreign products come into the United States, and if they should be transferred in any of our ports they go through the canal free, yet our American vessel, flying the American flag—or any other vessel, as to that, from any other country on earth—must pay the tolls.

But I must pass to the consideration of another branch of the question of free tolls. Failing in cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Panama, it was once the dream of the people that a great railroad on the leviathan order might be constructed over the Isthmus so that a ship and cargo might be transported without breaking bulk. Suppose this beautiful dream had been realized, would the advocates of free tolls be here asking for free passage across the Isthmus of Panama on this titanic railroad? The railroad would not have cost as much as the canal, and the request made of the United States would have been just as reasonable. And, furthermore, it would be just as reasonable for the Government to own all the transcontinental railroads and give free passage, and to give free passage on the railroad in Alaska the Senate recently voted $35,000,000 to construct. Oh, when and where will this paternal doctrine find its limit! It will, perhaps, come when there is a higher order of created human intelligences, when the millennial dawn shall break upon the world, peace and good will reign forever, and, under the benign and beneficent influence of good government, the ethereal state of man will come when there is no more work. Considering the way this Government is drifting, that would be the result, if the money should only hold out.

Now, I wish briefly to refer to the transcontinental railroads, which, if we are to believe much that is said about them, if blotted from the map, the country would be better off.

I think, after all, there is some good in them. They may have done wrong, and, as long as they are owned, controlled, and run by men, they will do some wrong in the future. But they are not entirely engines of oppression. They may have extorted from the people when they should have let the people keep something of what they took. We are all too prone to look at the business of others through glasses other than our own.

Now, let us consider what the United States would be without railroads. Along the Pacific and Atlantic Oceans, the Gulf of Mexico, and the navigable streams, lined with green-fringed borders in a high state of cultivation, there would be beautiful and attractive homes and lovely cottages; but back of all these beauties and charms that contribute so much to man's happiness and comfort would be the wilds for the Indians and the deer.

We have an Interstate Commerce Commission, whose duty is to see that all these railroads are run in accordance with the laws made and provided for their control. They were taxed to build the Panama Canal, and naturally they would be unwilling for competitive vessels to be allowed to pass free through the locks. The law is such that they can not own vessels to work in conjunction with their lines and pass through the canal.

Railroads are great developers in a country, and sometimes, I think, they are too much abused. The public is too apt to get the impression that only the wealthy are the stockholders. This is a grievous mistake, and I will illustrate by taking the Pennsylvania Railroad, which on April 1 of this year had 89,602 stockholders; 43,158 of the number were women, and the average holdings of all the stockholders were 111 shares each. This shows conclusively that the stock was pretty well distributed, many people, no doubt, of moderate means holding it purely as an investment. Let them be controlled but not oppressed, and the country will fare better. Do not take from them and give to an already subsidized coastwise shipping monopoly.

It has been pretty well settled in the discussion that, taking the Isthmus before the construction of the canal, vessels landing at either side with freight must discharge the cargo, load it on cars, cross the Isthmus, and load into the waiting vessel. This requires an average of 12 days and costs $3 per ton, and all nations, including the United States, are on terms of entire equality. It is said by the experts the average toll per ton will be 60 cents. Now, the vessel has saved an average of $2.40 per ton and 12 days consumed in this transfer, and will make the trip from New York to San Francisco in less time than freight over the transcontinental lines. They will not be competitive in the way of terminal freights, but, as they must live, the cities not on navigable streams will have higher rates.

It should be well understood that unless the Government in regulating rates permits a margin for profits there will be no more railroad building in this country unless the Government enters the business.

Now, I wish to show we are not dealing with our neighbor, Canada, on terms of entire equality.

Take two vessels, one leaving Seattle and the other a Canadian vessel leaving Vancouver, both bound through the Panama Canal for points on Lake Erie. Our coastwise vessel passes through the canal free and the Canadian vessel pays the tolls. They both pass through the Welland Canal in Canadian territory on terms of entire equality and discharge their cargoes at Buffalo, or some other point on Lake Erie. Thus it would seem to an unbiased mind that the Canadian vessel was discriminated against to the amount of the tolls through the Panama Canal. It is too obvious that Canadian transcontinental railroads are discriminated against for me to pursue the matter further.

I wish to say, further, when the United States decides she must, in order to promote the welfare and upbuilding of this great country, take over all public-utility corporations, she but adds another to the threatened dangers now menacing this Republic.

That was rather a sad view the Senator of New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] took of the situation a few days ago when he had incorporated in the RECORD the declaration of another that in order to maintain the rights of the people of a certain class they would burn, murder, and commit other violence to secure their rights. They seem to forget that the courts of justice in this country are open for the trial of causes where the law has been violated. Yet I wish to say in passing—and I trust I do not take a too pessimistic view of the situation—unless this Government does something to keep from our shores by more rigid immigration laws to exclude the vile, unbridled, and uneducated people, who subsist on from 5 to 10 cents per day, then the pictures now painted in the newspapers of the horrors, desolation, and suffering in the coal mines are mild in comparison with the lurid conditions the future holds in store for us. Let us hope by wise legislation there are better conditions awaiting this country; but we can not properly assimilate such numbers so much unfitted for the laws of our land, and we should hold in mind that unrestricted immigration is the Iliad of many of the woes of this country, and there should be some check by legislation to it.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I desire to say this great Nation should not be characterized by illiberality in arrogating unto itself the right to decide in favor of free tolls for the coastwise vessels of this country against the views of so many of her own eminent statesmen and diplomats, as well as almost every civilized nation of the earth. The high purpose in the life of a great nation, as well as that of an individual, should be to do right; and thus established the United States would still remain in the forefront for international peace and the universal brotherhood of nations. But take the other course, and the furies of the commercial world may be turned against us in our onward and upward march to a still higher destiny, and God grant we may never realize the ominous picture of Story, America's great publicist and expounder of the Constitution, when he says of this great Republic:

> The fabric may fall at last, for the work of man is perishable and must forever possess inherent elements of decay.

She could well afford to adopt what the great Senator, Ben Hill, of Georgia, said on the floor of this Senate:

> Sir, there is but one patriotic course for men to pursue in the high position of this country. Call back, if you can, the people to an honest, renewed recognition of the obligation of contracts and of covenants. Teach the present generation, teach all generations, that implicit fidelity to obligations, fidelity to constitutional obligations, and fidelity to contract obligations, through all trials at any cost, is the purest religion, the wisest statesmanship, and the highest patriotism.

We should on this occasion, when our national reputation for fidelity and obligation to contracts is at stake, ponder fittingly these lofty utterances.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] on official business.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] and to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. This announcement will apply to any roll calls throughout the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of House bill 14034, the naval appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, at the time the consideration of the bill was left off yesterday afternoon all the committee amendments reported to the bill itself had been passed on, except two. The first of those, passed over by request of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES], is on line 14, page 26:

> Naval proving ground, Indianhead, Md.: Toward extension of powder factory, $500,000.

I understood that possibly the Senator from New Jersey would move to strike out that amendment on a point of order. I wish to say in advance, before the point of order is made, while I do not know the exact ground on which it is to be made I do not believe there is anything under the Senate rules which would justify the exclusion of the amendment on a point of order, because it is not new legislation, it is not general legislation, and it is not an amendment offered on the floor without having been passed on by the committee or without having been recommended by the department. All those factors have been complied with. It is simply, as stated, an extension of an existing powder factory, which has been in operation since 1898, and from time to time additional appropriations have been made so as to increase its utility.

The department is very urgent in its insistence that this provision should be inserted in the bill, because it considers it to be vitally necessary from the standpoint of economy and from the standpoint of efficiency, and particularly at this time, when there may be occasion for a speedy demand for smokeless powder.

I think for the reasons I have stated the point of order would not lie, if it is made by the Senator from New Jersey.

I now ask that the amendment be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the point of order been decided?

The VICE PRESIDENT. None has been made, the Chair understands.

Mr. HUGHES. The point of order was made on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. HUGHES. The point of order is that it is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What general legislation?

Mr. HUGHES. General legislation proposed on an appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But what is general about providing for the extension of a powder factory?

Mr. HUGHES. That is general.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair makes the inquiry.

Mr. HUGHES. That, in my opinion, is general legislation. It is not private, special legislation.

Mr. President, I will say that my object in making the point of order is to elicit information in reference to what is desired to be done in this connection. For a number of years I have been a proponent of the proposition that the Government should enter into competition with private powder manufacturers, so as to protect itself in the matter of fixing prices for powder. I was prominent in the legislation which brought that condition about. At one time there was a monopoly in existence in this country, and the Government had to pay any price the manufacturers chose to exact; but that situation has now changed. The Government has appropriated from time to time $1,300,000, as I remember, for the construction of powder works, so that we are now engaged in making something like 3,000,000 pounds of powder a year. The proposed new construction provided for in this amendment would result in the Government making all the powder it needs.

I was of the opinion, and I am still inclined to the opinion, that it would be nearly as bad for the Government to have a monopoly of the manufacture of powder and shut off private competing manufacturers from competition with it as it would be for private individuals to have a monopoly of making powder.

I have a peculiar interest in this matter, inasmuch as the powder which is furnished to the Government is manufactured in my home county. Six or seven million dollars' worth of property is located in that county in factories owned by the Du Pont Powder Co., which is used exclusively in manufacturing smokeless powder for the Government.

As I said, despite that fact I have been one of those interested in the movement to have the Government come into competition with the private manufacturers of powder. But this proposal means that we are to extend Government manufacture to the absolute exclusion of private manufacturers. I am firmly convinced that in the manufacture of powder, which is a progressive art or science, it would not be a good thing for the Government alone to be interested in its manufacture. I think the competition of private individuals would be as good for the Government as the competition of the Government would be good for private individuals.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question. Is it not a fact that it has been claimed and is claimed now that the Government is paying from 33 to 40 per cent more for the powder which it purchases than it would cost the Government to produce it?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator that something like that is claimed, and it may be true.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If that be true, is not that the all-sufficient reason why the Government should make its own powder rather than patronize even an American manufacturer who charges the Government from 33 to 40 per cent more than the price at which the Government itself can produce the powder?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say to the Senator, and I might as well say it now as at some time later, because I have no doubt that I will be charged with inconsistency before we get through with this and one or two other bills, that this is my notion as to what should be done in all these matters: I think, and I have thought for years, that the Government should be engaged in the manufacture of armor plate and should make its own armor plate. I have thought for years that the Government should have a foundry for the casting of big guns. The Government does not cast any guns, although it is a matter of record——

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is mistaken. The Government does cast big guns.

Mr. HUGHES. They have not the proper foundry facilities.

Mr. SWANSON. The Government casts a 14-inch gun at a cost to the Government of $60,000 and private individuals charge the Government $79,000 for such a gun.

Mr. HUGHES. Where is this?

Mr. SWANSON. Here at the navy yard.

Mr. HUGHES. How long has that foundry been in use?

Mr. SWANSON. For some time.

Mr. HUGHES. Not for some time.

Mr. SWANSON. It has cast 10 guns there.

Mr. HUGHES. I will not question the Senator's information, but I will say that for a number of years the Government did not have a foundry, and there are cases in the record from which it can be demonstrated that the Government was habitually charged more for castings than it would have been compelled to pay for the finished guns. In other words, while the Government was maintaining an expensive plant and equipment for the purpose of finishing guns from the rough castings the private concerns that made the rough castings charged them more for those castings than they would have asked for furnishing the finished guns.

My notion about all these things I will state as briefly as I can for the information of the Senate. I think the Government ought, and I have done my best to put the Government in a position where it could, build battleships, not that I desire the Government to build all its own battleships. I would be against that proposition, because the people of this country would not stand for the vast expenditure necessary to equip yards and appropriate money sufficient to handle the new construction called for by the naval program each year. And if it were done, naturally every private concern engaged or interested in the building of battleships would go out of business, and while the Government would be able to build the ships needed in ordinary times, when an emergency arose and it was necessary to prepare for war the Government would find itself with no private yards in which to have them built.

I think that would be a bad situation. I think the Government should have well-equipped yards to enable it to compete. The result of that policy has been that where private parties took seven or eight years to build battleships the Government has demonstrated at its own navy yards that they can be built in three years. The Government also demonstrated, although laboring under the handicap of shorter hours and a leave system, that ships can be built at much less cost in Government yards than private manufacturers were charging, and we checked the extortions of the combined private builders of battleships in this country by this Government competition.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. The Senator stated that the Government had demonstrated that it could build battleships cheaper in a navy yard than they could be built in private yards.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not say that.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not say that, but I think it comes very nearly being true. However, that is another question which will probably come up later.

Mr. OLIVER. I thought the Senator said that the Government had demonstrated it could build battleships more cheaply in navy yards than in private yards, and I was just going to ask——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to give the Senator some information. The Government is now building a 14-inch gun. Admiral Strauss, who has charge of it, says that they are now building a 14-inch gun at the Washington Navy Yard and that they are going to build 20.

Mr. HUGHES. They have done that for years. I am not talking about building guns. I am talking about the rough castings made in a foundry.

Mr. SWANSON. The Government can construct the gun for $60,000 and it buys them for $79,000.

Mr. HUGHES. The Government buys these rough castings from private individuals, and unless the situation has changed recently it paid more for the rough castings than it probably would have had to pay for the finished gun. I have contended that we should have a foundry, and I think I am justified in saying that the Senator from Virginia is mistaken when he says that they have a foundry at the Washington Navy Yard. It does not seem possible that that can be so or I would have known of it.

Mr. SWANSON. I will read what Admiral Strauss says.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator has read it, and I agree with it, but that has nothing to do with this case.

Mr. SWANSON. It is stated here by Admiral Strauss:

> It costs us to manufacture a 14-inch gun at the Washington Navy Yard $60,145. The last bids from the Bethlehem and Midvale steel companies for the same work were $79,800 for the first-named company and $79,200 for the second, but these bids were not accepted. The cost at the Watervliet Arsenal is $61,000.

Mr. HUGHES. The rough castings the Senator is speaking about were probably purchased from private individuals. I do not say that in every case the charge for the rough castings——

Mr. SWANSON. I am not discussing where they get the materials from, but what I insist——

Mr. HUGHES. That is all I am discussing.

Mr. SWANSON. It costs the Government $60,000 for every gun it manufactures in its own navy yard.

Mr. HUGHES. That is all I am discussing. I am not discussing anything else. I said that there are instances on record where the Government has paid more for rough castings than it would have had to pay for the finished gun. They have taken the rough castings over to the navy yard and put skilled mechanics on that work for months and then they have figured the cost.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator state what those instances are, so that we can know them, because if the Government has been paying more for rough castings than for finished guns it ought to be stopped. If that is going on now, the statement by Admiral Strauss seems to be very misleading.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will permit me to make my statement and do me the courtesy to address the Chair and ask me to yield, I will be obliged to him.

I will say to the Senator that that statement has been made over and over again. I do not know whether it is true now or not, but there are individual instances that can be cited, and it can beyond question be demonstrated that the Government has paid more for rough castings than it would be necessary to pay in order to obtain the finished product.

We have now at the Washington Navy Yard, as I said awhile ago, skilled mechanics, working fair hours, getting leave and reasonably fair wages, and we are called upon to stand back in admiration of the cost at which the work is being done. Nobody tells us what the basic raw material has cost us and how much private individuals have overcharged us on the rough castings for a gun which we can not make, and which no attempt is made to make, for the Government itself.

There is no reason on earth why there should not be a foundry over at that yard. There is no reason on earth why there should not be foundries enough to enable the Government to check combinations of private gun manufacturers.

The same thing is true with reference to armor plate. I am not criticizing the committee. Of course, I understand the committee is doing the best it can. I understand that the proposition to establish a plant was looked on with favor in another body, but that it was regarded as inadvisable to go into it at this time. Something like $7,000,000 was needed to start an armor-plate plant, and the reasons for not attempting it now were probably sufficient. I am not quarreling with the committee. I am simply pointing out the situation that exists here. Here we have competition. We have the Government making one-third, at least, of the smokeless powder that it uses, and now this proposition contemplates making it all. At the same time the committee looks with equanimity upon this other situation under which the Government is absolutely held up by gun casters or molders and the armor-plate makers.

I am indifferent as to what the Chair does with reference to the point of order. As I have said, I have a sort of selfish interest in the proposition. Nearly all the smokeless powder that is sold to the United States Government is made in the county of Passaic.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator pardon me just a moment for a question for information? What page of the bill is it that the Senator thinks gives the monopoly to the Government?

Mr. HUGHES. It is on page 26, line 12. I have contended always that the Government should engage in certain industrial activities in order to protect itself against combinations and monopolies. It should engage in the construction of battleships, and it has engaged in the construction of battleships. It should engage in the manufacture of armor plate, and I hope it will engage in the manufacture of armor plate. It should institute foundries in order to help the Government escape the exactions of the combinations of men who cast these guns. I have voted every time I had the opportunity to enable the Government to enter into the manufacture of powder, and the Government did engage in the manufacture of powder, and is now making about one-third of the smokeless powder that is consumed.

In addition to that, time after time Congress has limited the price of powder, and the Senate can now, by way of limitation, fix the price that the Government can pay. Not only that, but there is a board of officers of the United States Government who can fix to a penny the price that the Government will pay for this powder.

So I regard the policy of the Government in going into the business of making powder to such an extent as will necessarily drive every private individual out of it as being a policy of doubtful expediency.

As I said, the amendment may not be subject to a point of order. I am inclined to think it is, and I am sure that if it is not I can have a lot of amusement in the future on general appropriation bills.

I merely wanted to state to the Senate how I feel about this general proposition. The Secretary of the Navy says he does not desire to acquire a monopoly of powder making but that he wants to have the whip hand in this controversy. For the life of me, I am unable to see why he has not got the whip hand now, making a third of the powder, knowing precisely what it costs, and, under the law, having the right to fix the price.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will explain it. The bill appropriates for the purchase of 3,811,000 pounds of powder. It is estimated that the Government will make by building its own powder factory 2,500,000 pounds, which would leave about 1,300,000 pounds to be bought of the Du Pont Co.

Now, there is no other buyer for the powder. The Government is compelled to have it, and can not get along without it. Suppose the Government, having no one else to buy it from, is compelled to pay the price of the manufacturers, subject to the limitations fixed by Congress, which is 53 cents a pound?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. SWANSON. Who else buys it?

Mr. HUGHES. The board of officers fix the price.

Mr. SWANSON. The board of officers do not fix the price. The statute says that they can not pay in excess of 53 cents a pound.

Mr. HUGHES. Exactly, and as much less as it can be purchased for.

Mr. SWANSON. But one person can furnish the Government the Du Pont powder. This appropriation of $500,000 will enable the Government to equip the Government factory, and when the Government comes to buy the one million and a half or two million pounds of powder, if the private manufacturer charges too much for it we can proceed in the Government factory to make it.

In the testimony before the committee it is stated that with this appropriation of $500,000 we would not then be at the mercy of the Du Pont Co. for the amount of powder needed for the Government.

I should like to say in this connection that the Government makes this powder at 40 cents. That includes overhead charges, and 3 per cent interest on the investment; and it pays 53 cents, which is 13 cents lost to the Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senator from New Jersey, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] a question. If I understood the Senator, he said that the limitation in the bill was 53 cents and that the Government made powder at 40 cents. Then, why do you not change the limitation and provide in this bill that the Government shall not pay over 43 cents?

Mr. SWANSON. The only reason is that you are absolutely at the mercy of the Du Pont Co.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then you would not be at their mercy.

Mr. SWANSON. They would not sell it; you would be at their mercy. You must have powder to arm your ships, in the first place. As soon as a battleship is constructed it is armed and its munitions are furnished. The law requires it. That is fixed. If you have not some way to get powder, the ship is absolutely useless. So the only way you can compel them to sell for a reasonable price is for the Government to be able to make all the powder that it wants.

Mr. WARREN. Does the Senator from Virginia think, with this proposed addition, that in case of war with a foreign country the powder mills would be able to furnish the amount of powder needed?

Mr. SWANSON. They think so.

Mr. WARREN. Who thinks so?

Mr. SWANSON. The Secretary of the Navy thinks so.

Mr. WARREN. The ordnance officers here think right to the contrary.

Mr. SWANSON. They think that in case of an emergency, a great war for a prolonged time, the Government should have the power to manufacture all the powder it needs; but the Secretary of the Navy states that he does not purpose to do so; he thinks the powder plant of the Du Ponts should continue, and that the Government should be able to manufacture all the powder it needs annually on a peace basis so that it could compel the powder manufacturers to make contracts at a reasonable price.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, would the Senator desire to have the Du Ponts and others continue their concerns, so that in case of war we would be able to purchase powder?

Mr. SWANSON. The Secretary of the Navy states that he desires them to continue; that he has no purpose of putting them out of business; that the only contention he has is as to the price paid. It is utterly impossible for the Government to get powder at a reduced price unless the Government is in a position so as to make the powder. In his testimony, as stated by the Senator from New Jersey, the Secretary of the Navy says this is the only way in which we can obtain powder at a reduced price.

Mr. WARREN. I am quite familiar with all that has heretofore passed as to the Du Ponts. In the time of the Spanish-American War we had many contracts with them, and the Government reduced the price 3½ cents a pound without even a requirement of law at all. I hold no brief for the Du Pont people; but I do want to see some portion of this powder made by somebody else besides the Government, so that the machinery may be in existence when we get into a war in order that we may be able to purchase some portion of the powder; for, as the Senator knows, powder is contraband. We could not buy a dollar's worth of powder from another country as soon as we are at war with any foreign power. Whatever may be necessary for a powder plant we may provide, but I think the Senator should not take the ground that the Government is going to undertake to make all of its powder, because, first, it would require a plant costing many millions of dollars to do it, and, secondly, it would be utterly unable to furnish powder enough in time of war.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me to make this clear, I will say the Government proposes to make an expenditure of $500,000 for the addition to the present plant, which will be equipped so that it can manufacture enough powder to supply what the Government may need each year.

Mr. WARREN. No; it would require $800,000, according to the testimony here, to be able to make more powder.

Mr. SWANSON. That is in time of peace?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. Three per cent on the $500,000 is $15,000 a year.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like to continue my statement and get through with it. I did not yield to the Senator to make a speech.

Mr. WARREN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I will wait until he has concluded.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator had better reserve his argument until the point is made.

Mr. President, with reference to the point made by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], I want to say to the Senator, once and for all, that I do not care what he says, a certain board of officers—the title of which I do not now call to mind—officers of the United States Government absolutely fix the price of this powder; that is all there is to that. The Secretary of the Navy, through his control of that board of officers, or Congress, if it so chooses, can, as it has done time and time again, fix the price at which this powder shall be purchased. The only question to be decided here is whether the Senate thinks it is a proper policy for the Government to engage in the exclusive manufacture of its own smokeless powder under conditions which would render it impossible for private manufacturers to exist. That is all there is to this question.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I ask the Senator from New Jersey if he does not know that the position of the Secretary of the Navy is that the Government, with this increase, will be able to make all the powder necessary for the Navy; but it will not necessarily make it all, depending, of course, upon the price that the powder concerns fix for powder? But the Government must have the whip hand. That is the position of the Secretary of the Navy; and I believe the Senator from New Jersey knows it.

Mr. HUGHES. And the Senator from New Jersey knows more than that.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator from New Jersey permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HUGHES. Gladly.

Mr. SWANSON. This is the proposition of the Secretary of the Navy, and I do not want him to be misunderstood here: He says that for an expenditure of $500,000 we can develop the capacity of the powder plant we now have. The interest on the investment at 3 per cent is $15,000 a year. Now, if you give him the power to expend that amount of money, with interest at 3 per cent—$15,000—it will be possible to compel the Du Pont Powder Co. to furnish its half of the powder, and to furnish the Government at a reasonable price each year; because, if that company does not do so, the Government may make its own powder. It will have to do so. Until it has that power as to half the powder that the Government purchases, it will be completely at the mercy of the Du Pont Powder Co.

Mr. HUGHES. I decline to yield further to enable the Senator from Virginia to make a statement which absolutely contradicts the statement that I make, and for which I, myself, stand as authority. I will say now that I will leave the disposition of this whole controversy by the Senate upon that naked proposition; and I will leave it to any other member of the committee except the Senator from Virginia, if it be not true that a board of officers has the right to fix the prices at which the Government shall purchase powder?

Mr. SWANSON. The board can fix the price, but——

Mr. HUGHES. I said I would leave it to any other member of the committee except the Senator from Virginia, who has stated over and over again that that is not so, and that the price is to be fixed by the Powder Trust——

Mr. SWANSON. I did not make that statement.

Mr. HUGHES. I understood the Senator to make that statement.

Mr. SWANSON. I said that the price could not exceed the 53 cents; that the board fixed it; but the board has no place to get powder except from the Du Pont Powder Co. If it should offer 48 cents a pound and have the offer accepted, the Government would get the powder.

Mr. HUGHES. Then the Senator does admit that the price is fixed by the board of officers.

Mr. SWANSON. The price is fixed by the board of officers, but the board can not fix the price, because there is but one powder company.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New Jersey made a statement with reference to the price of powder, and as he makes the statement, broadly, it is that the Government can fix the price. Of course I understand, as we all understand, that the Government can by law stipulate that it will not pay above a certain amount, and through any of these boards that it sees fit to appoint it may declare that it will not go beyond a certain amount. That is the Government's side of the contract. But does the Senator mean to say that, if by law or by the action of a board a price shall be fixed that is unsatisfactory to the private producers of powder, we could in any way compel them to deliver that powder at our price?

Mr. HUGHES. Of course the Senator from New Jersey knows that that would be impossible, and I do not think the Senator from Missouri is justified in taking up my time to ask me a question of that sort.

I can only say that the power and authority of the board of officers to fix the price of powder has no connection with the limitation of 53 cents. A limitation upon the price of powder is occasionally put on by Congress; it has been put on two or three times in my memory; but whether that is done or not, the authority of the board of officers continues; and this board of officers is charged with the duty of saying what price the Government shall pay for this powder; and it has never yet happened that the powder manufacturers have failed to furnish powder at the price fixed.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me there, the Government fixes the price at 53 cents; that is what they do now.

Mr. HUGHES. But Congress put the limitation on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will allow me, I have just said that Congress fixed the price at 53 cents.

Mr. HUGHES. Well, Mr. President, I should like to be given an opportunity to make my statement.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the price paid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey refuses to yield further.

Mr. HUGHES. Within my recollection Congress has, by way of limitation on an appropriation bill, provided that no part of the money appropriated therein should be expended for powder in excess of the price of 50 cents a pound, or whatever the price was. The board of officers could under that legislation say that a fair price between the Government and a private manufacturer would be 30 cents a pound. Their authority does not depend upon that appropriation bill. That board was in existence and was doing its work year after year when there was no legislation limiting the price which the Government could finally pay. So we find ourselves in the position that the Government is in active competition with private individuals, is making about one-third of its own powder supply, has the right to fix the price, has always fixed the price, and has brought the price down almost every time it has fixed it, and yet powder has always been furnished. So that so far as we know it can go on indefinitely saying precisely at what price this private concern should furnish powder to the Government.

Now we are asked to engage in new construction involving half a million dollars. In the hearings those who are asking for this appropriation for new construction say that with it they will be able to manufacture all the smokeless powder that the Government can use. I want the Senate to decide the question; I should like to have it submitted to the Senate; I do not want to take any advantage; and if the Senate thinks that it is the proper policy and the proper thing to do I want it to have an opportunity to say so, and therefore, so far as I am concerned, I will not insist upon the point of order. I should prefer to have the question submitted to a vote of this body for them to say whether or not they think it is a wise governmental policy to engage in an industry of this kind to such an extent that it means the exclusion of private individuals.

That is all there is to it. I have been on the other side of this proposition. All my life I have been insisting that the Government should go into various lines of business with the object of furnishing competition against private manufacturers who enter into combinations and force up prices to the Government, but I have never contemplated such a policy being carried so far as to make the Government the sole manufacturer or the sole entity carrying on any particular line of industry.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the senior Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HUGHES. With pleasure.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. If the Senator will allow me, I should like to say that prior to the Government entering into the manufacture of powder the price paid by the Government was fixed by the parties who manufactured it, and was only reduced by the fact that the Government did go into the manufacture of powder.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is absolutely mistaken. I thought he wanted to ask me a question——

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I am not mistaken; it is the absolute fact. So far as I am concerned, I do not think that the Government ought to manufacture all the powder which it may require, but there ought also to be private manufacturers, or corporations, if you please. At the same time, however, I do say that it is necessary to have some competition in order to get the powder at a proper price. That is the object of the provision here. The amendment does not provide for a new building, but only for an extension of the present plant in order to increase its capacity.

Mr. HUGHES. I decline to yield further. I thought the Senator wanted to ask me a question, and not to argue the matter in my speech.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the junior Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HUGHES. For a question; yes.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Do I understand the Senator from New Jersey to have withdrawn his point of order and to be arguing upon the merits of the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand whether or not the Senator from New Jersey has withdrawn the point of order.

Mr. HUGHES. I will say, Mr. President, as I said a while ago, that I have no desire to have this question decided on a technicality. I think the Senate has a right to pass upon the merits of it; and, for that reason, I withdraw the point of order, in order that the matter may be submitted on its merits to the Senate.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he has the data by which he could give me the difference in the cost to the Government of manufacturing its powder and buying it from an independent manufacturer?

Mr. HUGHES. I will say, yes. I can give the Senator the figures furnished by the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy says that, wages and materials alone computed, the cost of making powder is 38 cents a pound. I repeat, that is the estimate for wages and materials alone. I confess that I am unable to say to what extent the overhead charges of making powder will add to the cost. My experience—and I live in a powder-making district——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. I decline to yield.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is making a mistake——

Mr. HUGHES. Well, let me finish my statement. I have not been able to finish a sentence since I started. I will say that I come from a powder-making district, and I know that a great part of the charges in powder-making plants are overhead charges. The cost of occasional explosions does not, as I understand the Secretary of the Navy, figure in the cost at which he arrives for making powder. That you would call insurance, I presume, and it must be an extremely large item. Coming, as I have said, from a powder-making district and knowing the frequency with which explosions occur, it seems to me that the cost of insurance alone must be a tremendous item; but the Secretary of the Navy, as I understand him, says that he makes no allowance for the value of the land, that he makes no allowance for the value of the buildings and for various other charges which private individuals have to pay, those items in the case of the Government being paid for out of other funds. Consequently, it is extremely difficult to arrive at a proper basis of comparison as to the cost of making anything that the Government makes, with reference to a private individual engaged in the same line. It can be done; but no honest effort has ever been made, so far as I know, until a few weeks ago, to find out what should properly be included in the cost. The Secretary of the Navy has made an attempt to learn what should properly be charged against battleship construction as overhead charges——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I desired to ask the Senator—he has partially answered the question—if the Secretary of the Navy, in his investigations, has made any statement as to the saving to the Government by manufacturing powder for itself?

Mr. HUGHES. The figures of the Secretary of the Navy show that he can make powder for 38 cents, but he admits, at least he said to me, that the charges to which I have referred were not included. I asked him the question, because I am as much interested in it as he is, and I have been interested in it a good deal longer than he has; but it sometimes happens that a new convert is more zealous than an old believer, and I fear that perhaps he has been carried beyond the point of safety in his zeal. I said, in answer to the Senator's question, that the Secretary states that powder is made by the Government for 38 cents, figuring only wages and material. Of course, nobody else can make it on that basis; but suppose he comes to the conclusion by the use of the intelligence of men expert along accounting lines that because he makes it at 38 cents, figuring the things that he does figure, a private individual ought to make it at 40 or 45 cents, figuring the things that should be figured in his case. He can fix the price at that point; he can make a reasonable allowance for profit; and he can keep these men in business, which is something I regard as vital.

I feel that way with reference to the construction of battleships; I feel that way with reference to the construction and manufacture of armor plate and all the other things the manufacture of which is in the hands of a few corporations, where it is easy for them to combine and where they make a product which the Government must have.

Nobody seems to be worrying much about the fact that we are mulcted millions of dollars each year on the price paid for armor plate. That is a matter of common knowledge; everybody knows it; hardly anybody can be found who will deny it. I know it myself to be so with reference to gun casting. It was formerly so to a greater extent than it is now with reference to battleships. Nobody is worrying about all these things, but there seems to be a whole lot of solicitude at this time with reference to this one particular item, although the Government is better equipped to protect itself in this case than in any one of the others.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, does the Senator think that the addition to this Government plant would drive private enterprise out of the business?

Mr. HUGHES. I do; and that is what I want to lay before the Senate. That is the only object of this discussion. Admiral Strauss said that this money would enable him to build new construction enough to manufacture all the smokeless powder that the Government could use each year; but he admitted that if an emergency arose he could not meet it; and then, he said, he would rely upon private manufacturers. But a private manufacturer who has established a plant for the purpose each year of supplying powder to the Government, if he sees the Government constructing a plant big enough to make all of its own powder is likely to turn his attention in the direction of making some other kind of powder. The logical and natural result of this policy is the extinction of the manufacturer, so far as the making of smokeless powder is concerned.

That is the naked question that is presented to the Senate, whether we should rush heedlessly into a position involving an expenditure of half a million dollars in order to carry a policy beyond the point it was ever dreamed it would be carried—beyond the point of furnishing fair competition, beyond the point of defending the Government against the exactions of combinations of private individuals, and to the point of giving the Government itself a monopoly.

I am not going to contend, of course, that a Government monopoly is as offensive as a privately controlled monopoly. I do not believe it is. I do not see any particular wrong, as a matter of public policy, in a governmental monopoly. But I do believe—and I think the observation of every Member of the Senate will bear me out—that there are certain faults attaching to a private monopoly which will follow in the case of a public monopoly. I believe it will stifle enterprise; that there will be no rivalry, no competition. Government servants who are paid fixed salaries will be in charge of the manufacture of smokeless powder. As I said awhile ago, powder manufacturing is a developing science or process. The price of powder has gone down from eighty-odd cents a few years ago to 53 cents now.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator what put the price down? It was the Government going into the business, I believe.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator has asked me a question and then has very kindly answered it.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Is not that the case?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator has very kindly answered the question; so I will let it stand as it is in the RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I should like to ask my colleague if he believes the price would have gone down had it not been for Government competition?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think it would have gone down nearly as much if it had not been for Government competition.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. It would not have gone down a bit.

Mr. HUGHES. I have never objected to Government competition; I helped to establish Government competition; but I should not like to see the policy carried on until it discredits the men who originated it and defeats its own purpose.

I was a Member of Congress in another body some years ago when an amendment was offered which provided that no part of the money appropriated for the purchase of powder should be used to purchase powder from a trust, and in the same breath it was argued that all the powder was controlled by a trust. I had been doing some "trust busting" of my own and was at that time engaged in that popular pastime; but I saw and pointed out that the result of that limitation upon the appropriation meant that for a year the Secretary of the Navy, if he obeyed the law, could not buy a pound of powder; but that limitation went on the bill, it came over to the Senate, the Senate accepted it, and it became a part of the law.

It was argued then that the Du Pont Powder Co. was a trust. That was the common belief; I believed it; and I think there is not the slightest doubt about it. From watching the operations of that company in my own territory I knew it had gotten into the combination all the little fellows who were engaged in the various branches of the powder-making and explosive industry, such as capmakers, and so forth.

They all came under common control about that time. I knew that, because they were writing me letters protesting against the limitation being placed upon the appropriation bill; and all the letters, although they came from men whom I had known as being connected with separate and competing companies, this time came upon the stationery of the Du Pont de Nemours Co., showing that they had passed under a common control. I exhibited the correspondence very frankly and candidly to gentlemen who were seeking to put this limitation in the law, showed them that there was a trust, and that every concern in the country engaged in the manufacture of powder was in it at that particular time; and that with the limitation the American Government would be absolutely prohibited from purchasing a pound of smokeless powder during the life of that appropriation bill. Notwithstanding that, the provision went on the bill. Somebody had the curiosity the next year to ask the Secretary of the Navy how he got around it, and he said he regarded it as his duty to buy powder, and he bought powder, although he violated the law in so doing.

There were a lot of well-meaning gentlemen who thought it was a good thing to prevent the Government from doing business with a trust. As an abstract proposition I agree with that; but it is carrying it beyond reason, it seems to me, to legislate in such a way as to inflict a slight injury upon the trust and a great injury upon the Government. Suppose the Secretary of the Navy had been a stickler for law and an extremely sensitive and conscientious man and had held that he could not buy powder that year, and some great emergency had arisen, how pleasant it would have been for those gentlemen who had carried their "trust-busting" activities to the extent of preventing the United States Government from purchasing powder!

I am indifferent as to what happens to this proposition, so long as the Senate understands it. The naked question involved is whether or not we ought to go so far in any particular line—in the making of armor plate, the building of battleships, the casting of guns, the making of small arms, or any of the other activities in which the Government engages—whether we should go so far in any one of those lines of human endeavor as to shut out and extinguish private manufacture, particularly when it is admitted that the Government will be helpless in an emergency without the private manufacturer. That is admitted.

The admiral says that with the construction which he can put up with the money appropriated in this bill he can manufacture all the smokeless powder that the Government needs to buy under ordinary circumstances, and then in an emergency he will be compelled to resort to the private manufacturers. Suppose, however, there is no private manufacturer to resort to?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that if this amendment is agreed to the Government will save money by manufacturing all the powder that it will use under ordinary circumstances?

Mr. HUGHES. I think if it continues its present practice it will; yes. For the life of me I can not see why the Secretary of the Navy approves——

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as I understand, the only possible objection the Senator can have to this amendment is that in case of war or some emergency of that kind when we wanted a large amount of powder the Government would not be able to manufacture it, and in the meantime the private parties manufacturing powder would have gone out of business? Is that the idea?

Mr. HUGHES. Not altogether. Perhaps I should qualify my last answer to the Senator and say that I do not believe, and I have never contended that the Government does anything more cheaply than a private corporation. I have often contended, however, that the Government should do certain things, even though it cost a little more to do those particular things, because of the general benefit that will result.

For instance, I have never contended that it costs less money to build a battleship in a navy yard than it costs to get the same battleship from a private shipyard. Manifestly it can not be so, because the conditions under which the Government laborers are now employed are infinitely superior to the conditions under which the men in the private yards work. I want it to be that way, and everybody wants it to be that way, and we will not cavil about the little additional cost that goes to the welfare and the remuneration of Government employees. I know the Senator from Nebraska, at least, will not quarrel with that view. We will get that back, and more, too, in finding out, as we ought to be able to find out, and as any intelligent administration can find out, just what those battleships cost and just what they ought to be built for by private corporations.

Mr. NORRIS. I am trying to get some information from the Senator, because I know he is well posted on the matter, in regard to this particular argument about the powder proposition.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think they can make powder at Indianhead as cheaply as if it can be made in my own home county.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not exactly the question I wanted the Senator to answer. Let me ask him another one leading up to it. How are these private parties equipped who are now engaged in the manufacture of powder? Are they equipped for an emergency?

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. So if we did not do anything of this kind, and an emergency arose, they would be able to supply all that we could possibly use?

Mr. HUGHES. Yes. I am glad the Senator asked me that question. I want to say, though it may not be absolutely responsive to what he asks me, that their plants are scattered all over the country. I have said once or twice in this debate that all this smokeless powder is made in my county. I do not think that statement is strictly accurate. I know that for some time I thought it was, but I understand some of it is made elsewhere. Anyway, they have plants all over the country, and they can shift their orders and change about, and they are watching and ready to make the necessary expansion at any time.

Mr. NORRIS. That being true, as I understand, the purpose of this amendment is to enable the Government to get its powder at a cheaper rate. In other words, it is generally conceded, I think, that we have been paying too much for our powder. Now, if it is profitable—and it seems to me it is—for the Government to manufacture powder for the ordinary run of business in time of peace, if there is any danger of our not being able to supply ourselves in time of emergency, why would not a sufficient answer to that be that the Government should extend its operations so that it will be able to meet its own demands in time of emergency? If we can make the powder in time of peace for a lower price than we are compelled to pay to this so-called trust, why can we not do the same thing in time of war?

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator's question answers itself. If the Government were going into the powder business on a basis that contemplated supplying itself with powder in emergencies, it would render necessary a plant and an equipment which would be of such a character and such a cost that the Government would not be able to make its powder in time of peace as cheaply as it could purchase it.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I want to raise. Are we not paying too much now, in the judgment of the Senator? Have we not been paying too much in the past?

Mr. HUGHES. I can not say as to that. I do not set myself up as an expert. I know that the Congress has fixed a limit of 53 cents, beyond which they can not go; and there is a board of officers which goes into the question thoroughly and which has the Government costs before it. You see, the Government is very happily situated in this controversy. That is the reason I do not see the necessity for all this legislation on this particular matter, when there are so many other things crying for attention.

Mr. NORRIS. I think there are a good many other things crying for attention. I agree with the Senator; but, of course, we are not considering them now.

Mr. HUGHES. They should be in this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have them in this bill.

Mr. HUGHES. They are not here, however. They went out on points of order and in various other ways.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. So they are not here; but, at that, I think the committee is doing the best it can. I think the Secretary of the Navy is doing the best he can. I think he is addressing himself to all these questions and getting himself informed on them; but this proposition was tempting to him; it was easy to do; it did not require much money, and that is probably the reason why it was put in.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me it is altogether a question of fact whether or not in the past we have been paying an exorbitant price for powder, and whether we can obviate that difficulty by making it in some Government institution. If we can not do that, it would be foolish to go into it. If we can, we ought to do it.

Mr. HUGHES. In my judgment, this is the situation as it confronts us to-day: There is a board of officers which fixes the price of powder, and which can fix the price of powder to be purchased under this bill at 30 cents a pound, if it chooses. There is no limitation upon it. That board of officers has access to the cost figures of the Secretary of the Navy at the Indianhead factory. That board of officers can find out exactly what it costs the Government to make powder, and it can fix that price. The first time a private individual refuses to sell his powder to the Government at the price fixed by that board it might be well for the Congress to take notice of it, and to go into the business of making powder even much more extensively than is proposed here; but it seems to me that this is one branch of governmental and private activity in which the Government has more advantage than it has in any other.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator has just said that the first time the board fixed a price at which these people refused to sell it would be well to take up this matter. Now, I do not know the fact, and I am asking for information; but I understand that at one time the board fixed 48 cents, and the company refused to sell at that figure, and the Government, being compelled either to buy the powder at 53 cents or to do without it, bought it at 53 cents, notwithstanding the fact that the board had fixed 48 cents as the proper and fair price.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think that is true, but I will not challenge the statement.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Some member of the committee, perhaps, has the information and can give it later, but I have heard that.

Mr. HUGHES. If that had ever happened, it is very likely that I would have heard of it, because I have been active in this matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I should like to ask the Senator a question. This is a matter upon which I am not well informed. Suppose the Government builds a very large plant for the manufacture of powder. Is it probable that the demand would keep that plant in operation all the time, or what portion of the time, and would there not necessarily be a loss resulting from the fact that the plant probably would not be run constantly?

Mr. HUGHES. I think the manufacture of powder is a continuous process. I think, however, the Government has relied in the past very, very much upon the private manufacturers, and I do not think the Government is going to have the joyous time it anticipates when the private manufacturers go out of business.

As I say, I think the making of powder is a continuous process, and I think that with the proposed new construction and a steady customer like the Government this plant will be manufacturing powder about as advantageously as any governmental agency engaged in manufcturing.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I suggested to the Senator, I am not well informed on this question. My only thought was that the Government, of course, could not sell its product; it could only manufacture it for itself; and as a consequence it seems to me we would be wise to limit our productive capacity. That was the only thought I had in mind. I do not know whether this proposition goes to that extent or not.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HUGHES. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was suggested in a question by the Senator from Nebraska that possibly it might be well to build a plant sufficient to supply all our needs in time of emergency or in time of war. If the Senator has considered that matter at all, I will ask him whether, if a plant of that sort should be established sufficient to meet all emergencies in time of war, it would not be of such great capacity that the cost of making powder in time of peace would very much exceed that spoken of by the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HUGHES. It would be absolutely prohibitive. I tried to say that in answer to the Senator from Nebraska, but I did not state it so clearly nor nearly so well as the Senator from Wyoming has stated it.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand what the Senator said.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator from Wyoming had just asked me if the Government went into the business of making smokeless powder so extensively as to be ready to meet any emergency, what the effect on the price would be, and what effect the upkeep of that plant would have upon the making of powder in ordinary times. In my judgment, it would make the cost of making powder under ordinary circumstances absolutely prohibitive.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator another question. That being true—and I have no doubt, I will say, but that the price of powder in case of emergency would be higher than in the case of the ordinary use of powder from year to year—if it is wise for the Government to go into the manufacture of powder in time of peace to supply our ordinary and current demands because we have been held up and compelled to pay to a Powder Trust an exorbitant price for powder, why would not the same reasoning apply to powder manufactured in case of emergency? Would it not be more expensive for the private party to manufacture powder in time of emergency and get his material and his employees and everything ready to operate, the same as it would for the Government, so that in any event, in case of emergency, the price of powder would be increased?

If the theory of having powder made by the Government in time of peace is good, I can not see why the theory of having powder made by the Government in time of war for the same reason would not be good. Let us suppose that the Government does not engage in the manufacture of powder in time of peace. The people who are manufacturing the powder that the Government is using in ordinary times, and who are not making much more than the Government uses, would have in case of war to increase their output, their machinery, and their number of employees, and the resulting expense would have to be paid just the same.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator must understand, of course, that the making of powder for the Government is a very small part of the activities of the concern which is furnishing the powder to the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, then certainly the making of powder by the Government would not seriously interfere with the private parties who are making powder.

Mr. HUGHES. Oh, yes; it would. One of the plants is devoted exclusively to making smokeless powder for the Government, but in case of emergency they would not have nearly the difficulty that the Government would have in adapting to this purpose other plants which they have, scattered all over the country. Is the Senator aware that this plant on which it is proposed to leave the Government of the United States absolutely dependent for powder, consisting of 30 or 40 buildings, is situated in one spot, near the coast, and an explosion in any one of the buildings would absolutely destroy the plant?

Mr. NORRIS. I think if the Government was going into the manufacture of powder, and particularly if it was going into it to the extent of manufacturing it for cases of emergency like war, it would be very foolish to have only one plant and in one location. For business reasons, the same as private parties do, it would probably have several powder factories. Even though we were only going to manufacture powder for the ordinary consumption of the Government, I should think there might be good reasons why it might be well to manufacture it in more than one place. Why should we not pursue the same business methods that private parties pursue, if we are going into the business at all?

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, I agree with the Senator, absolutely; but the discussion that is going on between the Senator and myself is academic. This is not a theory that confronts us now; it is a condition. I agree with the Senator that if we do this thing we ought to go further, and that instead of an appropriation of $500,000 for new construction there ought to be an appropriation, perhaps, of $5,000,000 to put up plants in various parts of the country; to put up plants dependent upon each other, perhaps, but located in different localities, and located in the interior; but that is not what is proposed here.

It is proposed to extend the plant that already exists to such an extent that it will at least discourage, and in my opinion absolutely destroy, private competition. I would feel so if I owned that plant. If my best customer was getting ready to make the stuff that I was selling him, and was going to be able to make it in such quantities that he could make all that I was selling him, I would begin to think that my chances of doing business with him were very small.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HUGHES. In just a minute; as soon as I finish this statement I will.

It is proposed to put this new construction down here at Indianhead, where all the rest of the construction is; and it is not proposed to go on and manufacture enough powder to provide for emergencies. We are still going to rely upon the private manufacturer for emergencies; but nobody can tell—the Secretary of the Navy can not tell, and I do not know how any man in this body can tell—that the private manufacturer will be there when the emergency occurs.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

Mr. HUGHES. Now I yield to my colleague.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will permit a question, I desire to know if it is not reasonable for us to assume that the Government of the United States, having at hand experienced and expert engineers and powder makers, will be as circumspect as to the location and construction of buildings as will the private powder concerns?

The Senator says it is the purpose to locate this new plant at Indianhead, where, if an explosion takes place, it will annihilate all the buildings.

Mr. HUGHES. I did not say that.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Did I not understand that from the Senator?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know what the Senator understood, but I did not say it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I thought my ears were not at fault; but I take back that statement, then. I say we are safe with our engineers, experienced and expert in the location of powder plants, as a private individual would be; and I understand from that which I have seen in my State—and my travels around there have been about as extensive as those of my colleague—that these are very inexpensive buildings, as a rule, anyway. You find little huts up through New Jersey, up in Pompton and Hopatcong and up around in that region, very inexpensive ones; a little hut nestled in here and a drying house nestled over yonder; so that the matter of the upkeep of a plant would not be a very great burden anyway.

It seems to me the whole of this controversy is——

Mr. HUGHES. I have not finished, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not going to interfere with the Senator; but just let me say——

Mr. HUGHES. I will be through in a very few minutes.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will ask the Senator to let me proceed for just a minute, and say that the whole of this seems to me to be just defending a private monopoly. I believe the Government can manufacture powder a good deal cheaper than these private firms are willing to sell it to us, and in case of an extreme emergency we will be amply capable of taking care of it. These men will come begging us to buy their powder.

Mr. HUGHES. I thank the Senator for a very lucid exposition of the other side of this controversy; but I am compelled to say, in all frankness and candor, that what he says does not relate in any way to the proposition I am discussing. For fear the Senator's flight of oratory has driven it out of the minds of my colleagues, I will spend a minute or two in restating it.

The proposition is to extend this plant at Indianhead. The powder is made there in a chain of buildings, and an explosion in any one of the chain of buildings at Indianhead would stop the operations of the plant. Of course that is not true in the case of a private powder manufactory with plants scattered all over the country.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I should like to advise the Senator that in conversation this morning over the telephone with Admiral Strauss, who is in charge of this matter, he stated that the drying houses, and so forth, were so situated that an explosion in one would not endanger the others.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, the Senator is advising me of something of which I was thoroughly advised. He has misunderstood what I said. He does not understand what I am trying to say. I am not talking about an explosion in one drying house blowing up all the other drying houses. I say the powder is made in a chain of houses. Different operations and processes are carried on in the different buildings, and the powder is carried from house to house. A process in each house is necessary before the product is finally finished. An explosion in any one of the houses breaks the chain, and it is impossible to complete the process and manufacture powder until that house is restored.

I am not talking about an explosion affecting the other houses. Of course, common sense would dictate to anybody—an officer of the United States Navy or whatever he may be—that in making powder it is necessary to erect the different buildings at such a distance from each other that an explosion in one is not going to blow up the others; but when an explosion occurs in one of that chain of plants, until that damage is repaired, until that building is restored, until arrangements are made to carry on the process that is being carried on there, the making of powder absolutely stops. Therefore an explosion of one of these essential buildings at Indianhead will stop the Government from making powder. If the private individuals have been driven from the business at that time the Government will not get a pound of powder until the destruction created by that explosion has been repaired, until order has been restored, and the process has been installed once more.

Gentlemen, patriotic men, men charged with the responsibility of representing their States and their constituencies ought to be careful that misguided zeal in the chase of trusts and monopolies does not carry them into a position where they will be doing affirmative injury to the Government they are representing

As I said before, I am indifferent as to what the Senate does about this proposition; but I wanted to lay fairly before it the fact that it is now proposed, and it is the object of this amendment, to have the Government make all its own smokeless powder, and make it all in one place; that if we look for the logical consequences of our actions and conduct to follow, there will be nobody making smokeless powder but the United States Government; and then, when an emergency arises, we will have no place to turn. If an explosion occurs in one of that chain of buildings the manufacture of powder ceases until repairs have been made and the building has been reconstructed, and in the meantime the Government gets no powder.

So much for the mechanics of it; so much for the details. The other objection I make is on the broad principle that while I insist upon the Government going into the manufacture of anything that is vitally necessary to it, especially things the manufacture of which is generally confined to a few people who can readily combine, I do not want the Government to go beyond the point of proper competition to protect itself. I do not want the Government to become a monopoly itself, as I said before, not because I believe a Government monopoly is bad, but because a monopoly of any kind tends to produce certain bad results.

Just conceive of the manufacture of powder being in the hands of Government servants who are paid a fixed amount each year, regardless of what they do. Where is the incentive for Government servants to burn the midnight oil for the purpose of discovering new processes in the manufacture of powder? Tremendous progress has been made along those lines in recent years, and it is quite within the bounds of possibility that the powder that will be manufactured under this appropriation will be practically worthless before it is delivered, because of new discoveries having been made. These gentlemen are taking the chance of leaving the Government behind in the progress of this art or science.

Private individuals will reward men who make discoveries. Can anybody conceive of an officer of the United States Government, who in the course of his investigations stumbled upon a process which resulted in a reduction of the cost of smokeless powder by 50 per cent, being rewarded by a sum of money carried in an appropriation bill? Why, points of order would come from every direction; but the fact is that it would not be attempted. Private individuals can do those things, and do do them.

I have never contended that the Government does these things more cheaply than private individuals. It does not. The Government, in the face of private competition, keeps up and often forges ahead; but I should be very loath indeed to see the manufacture of powder placed altogether in the hands of a Government monopoly and have the paid servants of the Government the only ones interested in carrying on its production.

Mr. REED. Before the Senator resumes his seat I want to ask him if it is a fact that the so-called Powder Trust has for many years been engaged in the manufacture of powder and selling it to foreign governments, and if that one item would not probably keep the business alive even if the Government of the United States withdrew its patronage?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know anything about that, I will say to the Senator, except that I do know this: This knowledge has been forced on me by the fact that I live in Passaic County, where there is made much of the smokeless powder that is manufactured for and sold to the Government. Nearly all this powder is made in this particular plant, if that answers the Senator's question. I do not know anything about the foreign sales.

Mr. REED. I will ask the Senator the further question, if as a matter of fact while the Government purchases of powder do not run above probably 3,000,000 a pounds a year——

Mr. HUGHES. About 4,000,000 pounds.

Mr. REED. While they do not run above 4,000,000 pounds a year, there is a capacity to-day in the private plants controlled by the trust of over 10,000,000 pounds.

Mr. HUGHES. Smokeless powder, does the Senator mean?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. I could not say. I had better not say anything about that, because I do not know.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator a further question. Is it not a fact that, instead of keeping up with the advance of science when we were absolutely in the hands of this powder combination and had no factory of our own, they failed to manufacture up-to-date smokeless powder, and if we did not go into the Spanish War with that handicap?

Mr. HUGHES. There was not any smokeless powder during the Spanish-American War. The Senator is making an absolutely baseless statement, which has been made a hundred times. There was not such a thing as smokeless powder in existence in this country during the Spanish-American War. It was not in use in either the Army or Navy. They did not know what it was.

Mr. REED. I will ask the Senator if smokeless powder did not exist at that time; and I will add the question if the armies and navies of foreign countries did not have it.

Mr. HUGHES. I do not know. I know that we did not have it, and I do not care anything about what other countries did.

Mr. REED. I asked the question of the Senator in a perfectly courteous way, without the slightest idea of offending him. If asking him a question when he is addressing the Senate upon a subject that he claims to be familiar with is offensive, I apologize for having done so. I was seeking light, and if it offends the Senator to give it to me, I am very sorry that I trespassed on his time.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator managed not to disclose the fact that he was seeking information; at least I did not discover it. I have never claimed to be familiar with the advance of smokeless powder in the Army or Navy of the United States or in the other nations of the world. I did not say anything about the conduct of this or any other combination of men during the Spanish-American War. That was never mentioned in the controversy by anybody on either side. I pretended to no special knowledge in connection with it.

Mr. HUGHES subsequently said:

Mr. President, I ask permission to insert in my remarks two statements on this subject that appear in the printed hearings before the House committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Statement submitted by Mr. Browning.]

REASONS WHY THE PRESENT GOVERNMENT SMOKELESS POWDER SITUATION SHOULD BE LEFT UNDISTURBED.

First. Because with two plants of its own and three commercial plants the Government not only has abundant capacity but the source of supply is so distributed as to protect the Government in any emergency. As the Government prepares the specifications for making the smokeless powder, supervises its manufacture, fixes the price to be paid for the finished product, and is able to keep close track of the cost of manufacture by reason of the operation of its own factories, it has absolute control of the powder situation at the present time.

Second. Because when the Government, after experiments at Newport, decided upon the present type of smokeless power it called in manufacturers and turned the proposition over to them to perfect and make practical. As a result the Du Ponts invested several million dollars in plants, processes, and machinery, having faith and confidence that the business would be a continuing one. The taking over of the manufacture of smokeless powder by the Government would greatly impair this investment. These plants can not be used in the manufacture of other kinds of explosives.

Third. Because, according to the tables submitted by Admiral Twining, Chief of Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department, and Gen. Crozier, Chief of Ordnance, War Department, at recent hearing held by Subcommittee on Fortifications House of Representatives, it was shown that the cost of the manufacture of smokeless powder to the Du Ponts is approximately 49 cents per pound on a 5,000,000-pound output. The Government buys this powder for 53 cents per pound. This gives a profit of about 8 per cent, certainly not extravagant when the hazard associated with the manufacture of explosives is considered.

Fourth. Because the concentration of the manufacture of smokeless powder for the Navy at one point would be taking an undue hazard. Should the Government plant blow up or be otherwise destroyed in time of war, the country would be helpless. New plants could not be built in a few days. It would require months to build and equip a smokeless-powder plant.

Fifth. Because the taking over of this manufacture by the Government would impair present reserve manufacturing capacity. The Du Ponts could manufacture all the powder they supply to the Government at one plant. In order to meet all possible demands in the event of war, they maintain three plants. Thus the Government has five splendid, up-to-date smokeless-powder plants upon which to rely in the event of war. It is no exaggeration to state that this feature of national defense is the only one that is complete and satisfactory and can be depended upon to meet any demand at any moment.

Sixth. Because approximately $300,000,000 is expended annually on the Army and Navy, and less than 1 per cent, or about $3,000,000, of this vast sum goes for powder. Strange that all this sensational contention is made over the expenditure of this 1 per cent, while no question involving the expenditure of the 99 per cent is ever heard.

Seventh. Because little, if any, of the money appropriated by the Government for the purchase of smokeless powder is expended at the Government plants on experiments looking to the betterment of the quality. This work has been left to the Du Ponts. In their laboratories they expend approximately $500,000 annually, and a great deal of attention is given smokeless powder. This accounts for the fact that the United States leads the world in the general excellence of its powder.

Eighth. Because, taking into consideration the savings wrought by the system for the recovery of alcohol, for the reworking of powder, for the manufacture of small arms, etc., the actual value of the services the Du Ponts have performed for the Government far exceeds the profits they have obtained from the Government.

Ninth. Because the Government looks to outside manufacturers for much else than smokeless powder in the way of explosives used for national defense. In many instances these explosives are perfected after much trouble and expense, and turned over to the Government at actual loss.

Tenth. Because this Government is buying its smokeless powder 25 per cent per pound lower than any nation on earth buys a similar powder. The Du Pont Co. is selling powder in the markets of the world on this basis. It is not one of those companies that "sells abroad cheaper than at home."

Eleventh. Because Government monopoly is never advisable. France monopolizes the manufacture of smokeless powder, matches, and cigars. Admittedly it has the most inferior smokeless powder, matches, and cigars in the world.

Twelfth. Because the Du Pont Powder Co. probably enjoys the unique distinction of being the only concern selling the Government during the Spanish-American War that reduced the price of its commodity in the midst of the conflict.

INDICATING FAIR TREATMENT.

As evidence that the Du Pont Co. has not only been prompted by a spirit of fairness but a sentiment of patriotism in dealing with the Government, your attention to the following specific performances is called:

1. Conduct in war: It is a matter of history that the Spanish-American War was postponed several months because the Government did not have powder with which to fight that war. It might be said that in this emergency the Government was at the mercy of the powder maker. The Du Ponts in this crisis did not advance the price. A contract for 5,000,000 pounds of brown prismatic powder, at 32½ cents per pound, was made with the Du Pont Co., and every force was concentrated to fill the order. Commercial plants were robbed to equip and strengthen the plants hastily constructed to make Government powder.

After many thousand pounds of powder had been delivered on this contract an advantage in the manufacture presented itself by the expiration of a royalty, and the cost of manufacture was reduced 3½ cents per pound, thereby reducing, in the midst of the conflict, the price of powder to 29 cents per pound.

The war came to an end sooner than was anticipated, and but 2,200,000 pounds of powder had been delivered on this 5,000,000-pound contract. The Government communicated with the Du Pont Co., inquiring upon what basis it would cancel the remainder of the contract involving 2,800,000 pounds. The Du Pont Co. answered that it would gladly cancel the contract without compensation, as it was anxious to concentrate its forces in supplying the demands of the industrial world.

Other concerns dealing with the Government during that war not only increased the price of the product furnished to the highest limit, but demanded extravagant sums in lieu of the cancellation of contracts. On the basis of other settlements made, the Du Pont Co. could have held the Government up for more than one-quarter of a million dollars on the cancellation of this contract.

2. Dehydration by alcohol: This process for the replacement of water in guncotton by alcohol by use of a hydraulic press was invented and patented by Mr. Francis G. du Pont. It affords not only by far the most efficient and economical method for accomplishing this important step in the manufacture of smokeless powder, but, what is more important, invests the entire operation with an element of safety that is beyond estimate in value. The use of this process was given to the Government without charge and the presses now in use by the Navy were made from our patterns.

3. Recovery of alcohol: For a number of years the Government furnished the Du Pont Co. the alcohol entering into the manufacture of Government powder. Under the original process, once used this alcohol was destroyed or escaped by evaporation. At its expense and risk, solely in the interest of economy to the Government, the Du Pont Co. perfected a process by which the alcohol was recovered and returned to the Government. The Du Pont Co. had the assurance that if it succeeded in perfecting a system for recovering this alcohol, the expense thus incurred would be made good by the Government. The Auditor for the Navy Department declared this agreement not binding, and an itemized statement showing an expenditure of $75,000 was turned down. This process was given for use in both Government plants, notwithstanding, without a cent's compensation, and has already resulted in saving the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars. This saving will continue as long as smokeless powder is manufactured.

4. Reworking powder: Smokeless powder deteriorates with age and in time becomes unsuitable for use, resulting in large loss to the Government. The Du Pont Co. invented a process of reworking powder and handed this process over to the Government for use in both its plants without a cent's compensation. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been saved to the Government by this process.

5. A stabilizing material: Comparatively recently the Du Pont Co. brought to the attention of the Government the results of its inquiries and investigations with respect to a suitable stabilizing material for smokeless powder. This was adopted by the Government and more than doubles the life of this powder. This has not increased the price of powder to the Government, but has resulted in an enormous saving.

6. Powder for small arms: Several years ago the Du Pont Co. perfected a powder for small arms by the use of which the life of the rifles used by the Government has been extended from 1,500 rounds to 15,000 rounds and the accuracy life of the rifle not yet reached. This powder which was sold to the Government without any increase in price, gave to the 800,000 Government rifles an increased money value of approximately $20,000,000. The Du Ponts also gave the Government the right to manufacture this powder in its plants for a mere nominal royalty.

7. Nitration of cotton: This company has invented new and valuable improvements in the methods of nitration of cotton. Ingenious mechanical devices have reduced greatly the cost of manipulation and improved the quality of the product. These improvements have been offered to the Government for a nominal consideration.

8. Stability: The Du Pont Co. several years ago expended over $400,000 to obtain for the Government a new powder which they and the officials of the Government thought of great value. They might have gone into the markets of the world and sold this powder at an enormous profit, but at the request of the Government the company kept this a secret without the Government bearing any portion of the burden. Gen. Crozier and Admiral Mason are familiar with this matter. By reason of improvements made in our smokeless powder the new powder mentioned is now useless and the investment to the company was a total loss.

9. The Army powder plant: After Congress appropriated money to build a powder plant at Dover, following its policy of giving to the Government the free and unrestricted use of all it has and all it knows bearing upon the manufacture of powder, the Du Pont Co. invited the Government officials to their engineering department and gave them the use of every drawing it had. The company sent its engineers out to assist in laying out the Government plant. It is impossible to place an estimate on the value of the service rendered, the Du Pont Co. having spent hundreds of thousands of dollars in developing plans and economies that were freely given away.

10. The pyro incident: As indicating the disposition of the Du Pont Co. to be fair and honest and "on the square" with the Government, I will relate an incident that occurred a few years ago: One morning the gentleman at the head of our operating department came to me and told me that he was greatly distressed and disturbed over something he had just discovered in our smokeless-powder plant at Haskell. He said that an employee, without intending to defraud the Government, had been detected switching samples of pyro sent to the Government for testing purposes—substituting former samples shown to be perfect. He did this in order that he might make a good showing in comparison with other factories. This man had been with us six years, and during that time there had been manufactured 3,000,000 pounds of powder with which he had come in contact. A meeting of our board of directors was called and the matter was submitted. I explained how, if we were forced to take this powder back, it would cost us well on to $2,000,000. On the other hand, if the Government should use the powder and it should prove defective it might cost the Government ships and the lives of many men. There was no hesitation on the part of the board of directors. They instructed me to take the train at once for Washington and make a complete showing of what had been discovered. I got Admiral Mason and Gen. Crozier together and told them the story. Gen. Crozier said to me at the time that he had known many concerns to attempt to swindle the Government, but that this was the first instance in which he had known the principal to voluntarily confess a shortcoming. I requested that they should send officers to our plant to be present at an investigation. The committee appointed by the Government reported that they believed the powder to be of satisfactory quality, but since the Government had not been furnished with samples of each lot of pyrocellulose used in the manufacture they required the Du Pont Co. to give them a guaranty of six years on life of the powder. No greater percentage of the powder went wrong through these years at this plant than went wrong at the other plants, including the Government plants; but this confession and guaranty cost the Du Pont Co. about $50,000. (Col. Buckner's testimony at House hearing.)

Referring to the statements contained in the hearings entitled "Reasons why the present Government smokeless-powder situation should be left undisturbed": These reasons are discussed seriatim, under the same headings, as follows:

First. Heretofore no difficulty has been experienced in controlling the price of powder, and possibly such control under the existing arrangement might continue indefinitely. It is possible, however, that a difference of opinion might arise as to the proper price to be paid to the Du Pont Co., in which case the Government would not be in a position to dictate terms. The Government does prepare the specifications, supervise the manufacture, and has, for several years past, fixed the price to be paid for the finished product.

Second. The Du Pont Co. has made large investments with the expectation of getting a large amount of Government business, and but a small portion of its smokeless-powder plants could be used for other purposes. Since the beginning of the manufacture of smokeless powder, however, the Navy has placed orders in excess of $26,000,000 for smokeless powder, and the total profit on this sum would undoubtedly reimburse them for their investment should the plants now become valueless, and besides, yield them a very fair interest on the capital.

Third. The question of the cost to manufacture smokeless powder is discussed at length in this and previous hearings. What constitutes a fair profit is a matter which I do not feel competent to discuss. The hazard in manufacturing smokeless powder is negligible.

Fourth. I do not believe that there would be serious danger of the Government plant being destroyed, even in time of war.

Fifth. The large capacity of the Du Pont plants is a valuable asset for the Government.

Sixth. No discussion.

Seventh. I am not able to state what amount the Du Pont Co. spends for experiments, but they undoubtedly do spend large sums for experimental work and they have given the Government the advantage of it, either free or for a nominal consideration. The excellence of our smokeless powder can hardly be ascribed altogether to the experimental work done by the Du Ponts. The rigid specifications exacted by the Government as based on our own experience have contributed largely to that result.

Eighth. The Du Pont Co. has been very liberal in allowing the Government to use economical methods of manufacturing, such as recovery of solvent, reworking of powder, nitrating, etc., but I can not state whether or not the saving to the Government has "far exceeded the profits they have obtained from the Government."

Ninth. The Government does look to outside manufacturers for explosives other than smokeless powder, but I am not prepared to state that the manufacture in any considerable quantities has been at an "actual loss."

Tenth. I have reason to believe that the Government is buying powder from the Du Pont Co. about 25 cents cheaper than the company is selling it abroad.

Eleventh. I agree with the statement that a Government monopoly is not advisable in respect to the manufacture of powder. I believe that the Government needs competition as well as the private manufacturers need it.

Twelfth. The reason for this is discussed later.

In regard to the statements "indicating fair treatment":

1. Conduct in war: On March 17, 1898, the Bureau of Ordnance made two requisitions for brown prismatic powder. One was for 2,278,000 pounds and was placed with the California Powder Works; the other was for 2,308,000 pounds and was placed with the Du Pont Co. The price was to be $0.32175 per pound. In June, 1898, when the deliveries were not quite one-quarter completed, the price for the rest of the powder was reduced to 29 cents per pound. In the latter part of 1889, the Du Pont Co. entered into an agreement with certain foreign powder makers, by which the company learned certain trade secrets for making brown powder. In consideration of these the Du Pont Co. was to pay a royalty until a certain total amount of royalty had been paid. I can find no written agreement between the Du Pont Co. and the Bureau of Ordnance stating that the price of powder would be reduced by the amount of the royalty as soon as the total royalty had been paid, but references in letters indicate that at least a verbal agreement to this effect existed. Referring to "Extract from hearings" on the "fortifications appropriation bill" before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, Sixty-second Congress, third session, "Cost of powder," on page 327, there is a letter from the Chief of Bureau of Ordnance dated December 13, 1890, asking the Du Pont Co. for a statement of how much in royalties had been paid. On page 350 a letter from the Du Pont Co. to Mr. B. Peyton, of the California Powder Works, dated July 22, 1898, contains this statement: "We therefore suggested that July 1 should be the date at which the new price took effect, but unfortunately the Government was entitled to have received the 29-cent price sometime previous to July 1." From the above it seems that at least a verbal agreement to reduce the price of powder by the amount of the royalty existed in June, but there is no record to show whether this agreement existed prior to March 17, 1898, when the requisitions were placed, or was volunteered by the company when their payment of royalties ceased.

In addition to the 4,586,000 pounds of powder ordered on March 17, 1898, the bureau later agreed to order another 1,000,000 pounds of powder if the Du Pont Co. would install additional machinery and thus increase their output. Of this total of 5,586,000 pounds the company agreed to cancel the contract for 2,375,000 pounds of this powder, the manufacture of which had not been completed when the war closed. The company made no charge for canceling this contract.

2. Dehydration by alcohol: The Du Pont Co. invented and designed the present hydraulic press for dehydrating pyrocellulose. The Government is using this method with presses of the same design. Prior to that time, in France dehydrating was accomplished by spraying with alcohol. The process invented by the Du Ponts made the manufacture of smokeless powder practically a safe industry.

3. Recovery of alcohol: When the manufacture of smokeless powder was first started for the Government, the Government furnished the alcohol used. The company did at its own expense develop a method for recovering a large percentage of this solvent. A description of this method was furnished the Government without cost, and the system was installed at Indianhead beginning with the manufacture of powder at that place.

4. Reworking powder: The method of reworking powder now in use at Indianhead was designed by the Du Pont Co., but the successful dehydration of this reground powder was first worked out at Indianhead.

5. Stabilizer: The statements in regard to the Du Pont Co.'s bringing to the attention of the Government the results that could be accomplished by using diphenylamine as a stabilizer are correct; the stabilization of the powder has probably doubled its life and resulted in a very great saving to the Government.

6. Powder for small arms: The Navy purchases its small-arms ammunition from the War Department. This powder was invented and developed by the Du Pont Co. and greatly increased the life of the .30 caliber rifle.

7. Nitration of cotton: The statements in regard to the new mechanical nitrators are correct. The Du Pont Co. has recently given the Navy Department the plans, specifications, and the right to use this process for a nominal consideration, and the system is now being installed at Indianhead, where it will result in a material economy.

8. Stabilite: The statements in regard to stabilite are correct, but I have no information in regard to the amount expended by the company in developing this powder.

9. Army powder plant: The statements in regard to the Army powder plant are believed to be correct.

10. The pyro incident: The statements in regard to the pyro incident are correct. The officials of the company reported the fraud to the bureau as soon as they discovered it.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. But, if the Senator from Virginia will pardon me one word, the Senator from New Jersey had urged in his argument repeatedly, as I understood him, that it required infinite pains and care and industry to keep abreast of the improvements in the manufacture, and that that could only be done or would only be done in private institutions. It seemed to me therefore a pertinent inquiry as to whether or not the private institutions of this country had kept abreast of the advanced science of other nations, and that was the reason for my interrogatory.

Mr. WARREN. May I answer that question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. WARREN. Just a word on account of the inquiry made by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SWANSON. If it is a short statement I will yield, but not for a speech.

Mr. WARREN. If I may have the attention of the Senator from Missouri for a moment, the Spanish War developed that there was increasing use of smokeless powder. The United States Government took the matter up with the powder manufacturers of this country, cooperating with them, and started into the work of perfecting a process for making high-grade smokeless powder.

Soon afterwards, and I speak with some confidence, because I think I was about the first one to propose it, the Army provided for building a small powder-making plant. The Navy followed with its plant afterwards. The Army put its inventors and expert ordnance officers to work not in competition so much as in collaboration, if you please, with the makers to perfect smokeless powder, and ever since with the contracts that have been made between Du Ponts and the Government for Army and Navy there has been competition of mind against mind that has perfected powder to a great extent; and within the last five or six years there has been the greatest improvement of all, and that is in the durability of it.

Mr. REED. The fact then remains that when we were dependent altogether for our supply upon our private manufacturers they had fallen so far behind in the science of manufacturing powder that even Spain or other European nations had smokeless powder before they apparently knew anything about it.

Mr. WARREN. No; perhaps I misstated the case. They were already making smokeless powder, but not of the character that the Government was buying. In fact, they had no orders from the Government to do so.

Mr. REED. They were making smokeless powder for shotguns.

Mr. WARREN. It was new in the country.

Mr. REED. They were making smokeless powder for use in small firearms, a thing which had been done, of course, for many years. I understand further from the Senator now—and I am obliged to him for his statement; it is very enlightening—that the Government began to make powder itself, competition began to spring up, and that we began to get really a first-class powder.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. I can not yield any further. I am not going to speak over 10 minutes and the Senator from Wyoming can take the floor.

It seems to me that this matter is in a very small, narrow compass. I want to state in a very few minutes what is the purpose of the department. We consume about 4,000,000 pounds of powder a year. That is the yearly use of powder in the Navy. As soon as a battleship is constructed and completed it is furnished with ammunition and arms necessary for an engagement, and that will continue there until it is engaged in war. Powder very frequently requires to be reworked. They found that powder to a certain extent loses its strength. At Indianhead we rework the powder and it saves thousands and thousands of dollars each year. They have now discovered a process by which it does not require to be worked so much.

Half the powder is at present manufactured by the Government. The other half is purchased. There is but one concern that can furnish smokeless powder in the United States and that is the Du Pont Co. For that half we are completely at the mercy of the Du Pont Manufacturing Co. We recently passed a law providing that the Government shall not pay in excess of 53 cents per pound. Before 1903 the price was 80 cents a pound; in 1903 it became 70 cents a pound, and last year we put 53 cents as the ultimate amount that could be paid. That rate was fixed in the appropriation act.

Now, what does the Secretary of the Navy ask Congress to do? An investigation, thorough and complete, has been made by Admiral Strauss, the finest expert I think on this question in the United States, who was for years at Indianhead. They have made an estimate as to what smokeless powder costs the Government. We have never been able to get from the Du Ponts what their smokeless powder costs them. They refuse to furnish the Government any information on that subject.

In estimating this cost the Government divides it into three heads. First, there is the invoice price. In that is included the purchase of the cotton, the purchase of the alcohol, the sodium nitrate, the production labor, handling material, leave and holidays, superintendence and clerical force, repairs, labor and material, power expense, and other material. On that basis it costs the Government 29.9 cents a pound. Yet, to go further and include all the cost, there is another item of expense, and that is overhead charges. At Indianhead plant, where the powder is made, they have made a complete estimate of what all those overhead charges are. Those overhead charges include powder boxes, administration (officers' pay and allowances), pensions (disability pay), and all other items of overhead charges. That amounts to 8 cents a pound. Next they include interest. That is interest on what it costs for the plant and the money invested in it. After adding up all of these the Government estimates the cost at 40.1 cents per pound to make powder. These items are all that could be included. They are accurate, they are full and complete.

The Government paid last year for half the powder—the powder it bought—53 cents a pound, the ultimate limit fixed by law. The plant now produces more powder each year. From the appropriation of 1913 and 1914 the Government purchased four million and a half pounds of powder, paying 53 cents, at a loss to the Government of $585.000 in excess of what it would have cost if it had manufactured the powder in its own plant. Next year, if you pay 53 cents, the half that you purchase from the Du Ponts will cost between two and three hundred thousand dollars more than the half manufactured by the Government.

Now, what is the proposition submitted by the Navy Department? The department says we are completely at the mercy of the trust for one-half our powder. For $500,000 you can take the Indianhead plant and increase the capacity sufficiently to manufacture all the powder needed by the United States Government, so far as its Navy is concerned. For $500,000 in two years, if you manufacture it all, it would save the entire expenses of the plant.

Secretary Daniels says it is not his purpose to destroy the Du Pont factory entirely if they will come down to a reasonable price in selling their powder; but he says the fact that the Government has the power to manufacture all the powder needed will compel that trust to sell the powder to the Government at a reasonable price. He states in his testimony before the committees that if they do not come to a reasonable price and reduce the price from 53 cents, with that leverage he will proceed to make powder in the Navy factory.

Now, that is the issue before Congress. There is talk about the danger of the factory blowing up. The manufacture of cotton smokeless powder is practically a safe enterprise. It is not like black powder. It is comparatively safe, and the accidents do not occur that occur to other explosives.

In addition to that, we occupy this position in reference to our smokeless powder: The Du Pont Co. makes the powder according to the specifications, according to the plans, the investigation, and the direction of the department entirely, and we pay them this profit. We furnish the specifications and everything in reference to it.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the contention of the department is right and that we should be able to manufacture all the powder needed each year, so as to compel those who furnish us half to sell it at a reasonable price.

Now, the Du Pont Manufacturing Co., I will say, in justice to them, the evidence shows, do not sell powder abroad for more than they furnish it to us. They have dealt with this Government in a very liberal spirit considering that it was a trust, a monopoly. The evidence shows that. But because they have upon certain occasions dealt fairly with the Government there is no reason why the Government should pay two or three hundred thousand dollars a year in excess of what we ought to pay for the powder.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I understand it is not the policy of the Government to furnish all the smokeless powder, but it is proposed that part of it shall be manufactured by private corporations. That is my understanding.

Mr. SWANSON. Secretary Daniels stated distinctly in the hearings that he wants this appropriation so as to compel these people, if necessary, to reduce the price on the half the Government now buys from them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire very briefly to call attention to some statements which have been made during the progress of this argument.

One statement is that we must have competition in order to be protected against extortionate prices and that we acquired that competition when the Government a few years since established a factory of limited capacity. And yet it is admitted that if the Government factory were running at its full capacity it could not supply more than about one-half of the powder we consume.

That leads me to inquire what is competition. If I absolutely must have a thousand barrels of water to-morrow and one individual controls the only water supply, I am at his mercy. There is no competition. If I create a supply for 100 barrels of water there is competition as to 100 barrels, but there is no competition as to the 900 other barrels of water which I must have. If the Government of the United States is obliged to have for its Navy 4,500,000 pounds of powder annually and has established a factory with a capacity of 2,225,000 pounds and the other 2,225,000 pounds can only be purchased from one concern, as to the one-half which the Government is unable to produce there is no competition. To the extent the Government is unable to meet its own demands for powder it is as completely at the mercy of the trust or combination as it was with reference to the whole before it established a plant.

It follows, therefore, as night follows the day, that competition does not exist so that it can be thoroughly potential unless there are two sources from which you can draw your supplies and each is substantially able to furnish the entire supply. Therefore, if we are to have a competition which will relieve the Government from the exactions of a monopoly and make it independent of the monopoly, we must have a source of supply which is independent of the monopoly and which is equivalent to the demands we must meet.

In other words, when the Government of the United States builds a factory large enough to make all its own powder, then, and not until then, will it be in a position to dictate terms to the Powder Trust and be independent of the Powder Trust.

Having once acquired that capacity, the Government may then run its mills to their limit or it may run the mills at one-half capacity and buy the amount of powder which is necessary to supply the deficiency. It then has potential competition as to all the powder it desires to use. It can protect itself and exact fair treatment. Short of that it is at the mercy of the trust.

Mr. President, it is stated here that if the Government were to build a plant with sufficient capacity to supply its own needs, immediately the private manufacturers would go out of business and the Government would be in a hopeless condition in time of war, because its plant would not have a sufficient capacity to meet the increased demands incident to a war.

Let us analyze that statement. Before the Government ever built a factory, what was our position? We were buying our powder from what is here denominated a powder trust. If that company was manufacturing only for the United States, it is fair to believe that it did not build a plant with a surplus capacity sufficient to meet the demands of a great war. The trust is not so inspired by patriotism as to lead it to so vast an expenditure. Therefore we were dependent upon one factory, presumably running fairly near its capacity. It follows that when we built a Government factory we simply safeguarded ourselves by adding another source of supply. We took over to ourselves an additional protection in time of war.

If we now should make our Government factory equal to the entire demands of our Government, would we not be as well off with that factory under governmental control as we were before we built any factory at all and were obliged to rely absolutely upon a privately owned factory? The question answers itself.

If we want to have a real surplus of manufacturing ability sufficient for a war emergency, the thing to do is to build a Government factory capable of making all of our powder used in ordinary times. Then, having created that governmental competitive unit, we will have two sources of supply, each with a surplus capacity, each capable of coming to our rescue in time of war. In time of peace each factory can be given a fair amount of work, the Government being all the time in a position to demand fair prices because it is in a position to make all the powder it needs and is not, therefore, forced to buy on the terms offered by the trust. The argument, therefore, that if the Government dares build an addition to its factory it will be helpless in time of war seems to me to be somewhat weak, if not ridiculous.

I offer another observation. I understand that the total consumption of powder in the United States to-day is about 4,500,000 pounds.

Mr. WARREN. That merely applies to the Navy. It does not cover the Army.

Mr. REED. I am speaking of the Navy; this bill applies to the Navy, and I hope that all my figures will be taken as applying to that case. Of that consumption our own factory produces over half. Therefore the total demands by the Navy upon the Powder Trust are probably in the neighborhood of 2,500,000 pounds.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I fear the Senator from Missouri is slightly in error with respect to his last statement. I know he will be glad to have it corrected.

Mr. REED. I shall be glad to have it corrected.

Mr. O'GORMAN. A year ago an order was given to the Du Pont Co., which was the only bidder, for 4,500,000 pounds of smokeless powder. That quantity was furnished by the Du Pont Co. to the Government at an estimated loss to the Government of $585,000, based upon what it would cost the Government to furnish that identical quantity.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator from New York. The figures I had in mind were derived from the consumption item instead of the item of purchase, which includes the additional item of powder stored for war emergencies. I will accept 4,500,000 pounds as the amount we must buy. The capacity of the mills of the trust, according to the best information I can get, is 10,000,000 pounds. They do not maintain that additional capacity, as I said a few moments ago, out of any patriotic reason. There is some other occasion than that surplus. The reason is found in the fact that this trust, combination, or company, or by whatsoever name you see fit to designate it, is engaged in making smokeless powder and selling it to other nations. That being the fact, it is idle to say that the trust will close its factory, dismantle its works, and go out of business simply because the Government of the United States sees fit to build an addition to its powder mill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Is the Senator from Missouri aware of the fact that the smokeless powder manufactured by the Du Pont Powder Co. is manufactured upon the formula furnished by the Government?

Mr. REED. I so understand the fact.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That formula the Government guards very carefully from publicity. I ask the Senator from Missouri if he is also aware of the fact that the Du Pont Powder Co. manufactures upon the Government's formula the powder that it sells to the other Governments of the world?

Mr. REED. I would have to answer that, if I were entirely frank, and I wish to be, by saying that I do not know that to be the fact, but I have heard the charge made. If the Senator from Wisconsin does know the facts I should be very glad to have them put into the RECORD now or at such time as suits the Senator's convenience.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My attention has been directed to an article recently published in Harper's Weekly, entitled "The Powder Trust." The writer of that article quotes the sworn testimony of an investigation of the Powder Trust, conducted,

I assume, by Congress, though I have not been able to discover just when or by what committee the inquiry was made. In that investigation Gen. Crozier testified as follows:

I would like to state that some parts of these specifications—

Referring to the specifications upon which the powder is manufactured—

Are regarded in a measure as confidential. We are very careful as to whose hands they should fall into.

In that same investigation the vice president of the powder company testified—I can read it without delaying the Senator more than a moment——

Mr. REED. Take your time.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He testified that the Powder Trust also sells powder of the same kind and grade as that used by our Government to any foreign Government which cares to purchase it.

Edmund G. Buckner, vice president of the Du Pont Powder Co., made the following statement on the stand:

I can see no reason why the merchants of this country should not be permitted to do a business of that kind. Smokeless powder is not a secret. It is a question of ability to make it, and because we have reached a superior position in the art of manufacturing smokeless powder we are taking nothing, I should say, from the defense of this country by selling in times of peace this article to any other Government that might want it.

He testified, further, on being questioned:

Does your company furnish any other Governments with ordnance powder?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Is it similar to that furnished the United States?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir; it is similar.

It is the same kind of powder?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

It is exactly similar?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir; I would say that it is the same powder.

Has that been the custom of your company at all times?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir.

Is the character of the powder you furnish the American Government the result of particular requirements of the Army and Navy?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir; they give us specifications that they want us to fulfill.

And is that same compliance with these specifications had in regard to powder furnished other Governments?

Vice President BUCKNER. We think that is the best powder and we make it that way.

The result of that being that any other Government in making purchases from you obtains the benefit of the furtherance that has been made in the development of that powder by the United States Government?

Vice President BUCKNER. Yes, sir; that is true.

The American Government, then, obtains no advantage in the character of the powder manufactured by you?

Vice President BUCKNER. I should say not.

On the other hand, the information that they (i. e., the Army and Navy) give you in regard to the making of powder of good quality is used by you in making the powder for other Governments?

Vice President BUCKNER. We make powder for them; yes, sir; we have never, however, given the information; we have simply sold the product.

Now, just a word, if I am not overtaxing the patience of the Senator from Missouri. It seems that this Government would do well to make an appropriation large enough to enable it to manufacture all of its powder, so that it would not be compelled to surrender to any private corporation the secret processes which it has developed. The superiority of this powder has been worked out in the Government's own factory and then the formula turned over to the Powder Trust because the Government in its own factory could not manufacture enough of the powder to supply itself. I believe that we would do well and act wisely if we invest enough money to enable the Government to manufacture enough powder to supply all of its needs and to be absolutely independent of the Powder Trust.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am obliged to the Senator for his interruption. I had heard of these matters, but I had not seen the article of May 2 in Harper's Weekly. I must assume when a publication of the standing of Harper's Weekly professes to set forth in hæc verba evidence given upon official hearings that the matter is correctly presented. I would not always make the same statement with reference to comments or expressions of opinion, but when a statement is made purporting to be from the records I must accept it as correct.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. I think the statement made is correct, so far as it goes; but it will be noticed in Mr. Buckner's reply that he does not admit or claim that the Government has furnished him any secret information. In fact, all of the evidence before the committee heretofore has been that all of the secrets and matters pertaining to the making of powder have come from the Du Ponts to the Government, rather than from the Government to the Du Ponts, except as they have cooperated, and I think they have cooperated all of the time since the Government has gone into the making of powder. It is true, as stated, that the Government has its specifications, but those specifications are largely made up from the information originally obtained from the people who make the powder, and from trying out in the Government's various projectiles the powder thus made.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me right there——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that the present specifications for smokeless powder made for the Government have been collected after governmental tests, which are very expensive, including shooting at long distance, piercing armor, and so forth, which it is impossible for private enterprises to conduct.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is right as to that.

Mr. SWANSON. I think this character of powder was selected after tests conducted at Newport; and, as I have stated, it is impossible for private enterprises to conduct such tests. I think nearly all the experiments in connection with this powder as to its efficiency, carrying power, and destructive power must necessarily be conducted by the Government.

Mr. WARREN. That is very true.

Mr. SWANSON. So far as some of the chemical processes are concerned, I know the Du Pont Co. recently discovered a method of preserving the efficiency of powder, or making it last longer, and they gave that to the Government; but as to the specifications of real efficiency, the destructive power of the powder, and so forth, they must come from experiments conducted by the Government, in which private enterprise can not engage.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator from Missouri will allow me to make an observation, the Senator from Virginia is right. As a matter of fact, the information as to chemical processes, combinations, and so forth, come to the Government largely from the Du Ponts. The Government, on the other hand, has tried out this powder under all circumstances, and, working in harmony with the Du Ponts, the degree of excellence has been attained which the Government demands in the making up of powder. The Du Ponts have charged little or nothing to the Government for their secrets and have retained none. On the other hand, the Government has not denied the privilege, as I understand, to the Du Ponts to manufacture powder for whoever they may choose on any required specifications.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the scope which this discussion is now assuming ought to have required some careful preparation. I rose here merely to reply to some observations which had been made and which I thought were unsound; but, Mr. President, it is charged in this article under quotation marks that Gen. Crozier, whose standing is not challenged by any man, stated upon this hearing:

I would like to state that some parts of these specifications are regarded in a measure as confidential. We are very careful as to whose hands they should fall into.

The article further states:

So vital did Gen. Crozier regard the mere specifications of the smokeless powder that he objected to certain specifications being shown. And they were not shown.

That is, they were not even shown to the committee.

If it be true—and it must be taken as true, because the representative of the Powder Trust so states—that this powder, the manufacture of which has been worked out in part by Government experts, the tests of which have been made by the Government, and the secrets with reference to which are of great importance—if it be true that all of the benefits of this knowledge have been by the trust turned over to foreign Governments, then I say the time has come to stop the manufacture of Government powder in any private plant.

It is said by this powder merchant that the trust only sells powder to foreign Governments in time of peace. Of course it has so far only sold it in time of peace, because we have had no foreign war since the trust found out how to make smokeless powder for ordnance.

A concern, however, that sells this powder to-day, when we are at peace, sells it with full knowledge that it can now be preserved for many years; that every Government is laying up stores of it; that we are seeking to put aside vast quantities of it ourselves, to keep for emergencies. The trust is therefore putting into the hands of foreign powers the improved powder which has been wrought out in part by the genius of the employees of the Federal Government. The powder may at any time be used to hurl shot and shell against our own ships and fortifications.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. PAGE addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield, and to whom?

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment. The trust is giving to foreign Governments the full benefit of all the knowledge which has been obtained through Government tests and through Government assistance, except that the trust preserves the secrets of the manufacture in order that it may enjoy a monopoly of the sale to foreign Governments.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. I think the Senator from Missouri has been led into error in the remarks which he has just made about foreign governments buying vast quantities of powder and storing it for future use.

In the first place, powder deteriorates to a considerable degree, so that no nation would keep on hand a very large supply of it. In the second place, foreign governments are in the habit of purchasing only their surplus supply in this country; and it is not true that we manufacture a better powder than do many plants that are located in Europe.

What I rose particularly to call to the attention of the Senator from Missouri, however, was the reflection which he made on the possibility that the Du Pont Powder Co. might sell powder to other governments with which we might be at war. I have seen it stated in the public press in several instances lately that the Du Pont Powder Co. had a contract with one of the contesting parties in Mexico to sell powder to it, and that the company referred the matter either to the Navy Department or to the War Department and asked if it would be inimical to the interests of this country if it carried out the contract, stating that it would cancel the contract if that were the case.

I do not know that that is true, but I think in justice to the company it should be said that it was generally reported in the public press.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if that be the fact, then the Du Pont Powder Co. should be given due credit. But the Senator to some extent misapprehends my remarks.

In the first place, it is true that powder is now preserved for considerable periods. One of the items contained in the reports filed in connection with this bill is a statement with reference to the capacity of our own Government factory to work over the powder in order that it may be kept in proper condition.

As to foreign countries buying only their surplus supply in this country, if—as the representative of the trust says—this is the best powder in the world, then you may be sure the foreign governments will acquire it whenever they can get it.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. REED. In just one moment. The fact that when actual war was impending in Mexico the Powder Trust came to our Government and asked its opinion as to whether or not it ought to furnish somebody powder does not at all meet the proposition that other nations may be accumulating this powder and laying it by before any cloud of war has arisen.

I should hesitate to charge any American citizen, whether he was a violator of our trust laws or not, with so base a thing as the sale of powder to a nation actually at war with us. One reason I would have confidence that he would not do it is because if he did he would be guilty of treason to this country, and would be likely to be executed for making profits in that way. He would be giving aid and comfort to the enemy in time of actual war, and it would be an overt act.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. REED. I do; yes.

Mr. PAGE. What I am particularly interested to know is whether the sale of powder to a foreign country is made over the protest of the United States, or whether it is not absolutely true that the United States controls the entire matter, and consents only when it wishes to consent that the powder company shall sell to foreign nations?

If the powder company is doing a dishonorable thing, I should like to know it; but if it is acting entirely in accordance with the wishes of the Federal Government in regard to powder, it seems to me the charge the Senator makes is wrong, and ought not to be made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have not made a charge. I listened to the reading of this evidence by the Senator from Wisconsin. I read a paragraph or two myself, and then I ventured the observation that if it be true that this is the best powder in the world, that it was worked out, in part, through the genius of the Government experts, and if its secrets are by the Government carefully guarded—if all those things are true, and if, being true, a private company is selling this powder to foreign powers, we ought to build our own factories and guard our own secrets. I have charged nothing against any person. I am simply discussing the evidence.

Mr. President, I do not want to indulge in any vituperation; but there is a sentence or two here, in the statement attributed to Mr. Buckner, of the trust, which deserves attention:

> I can see no reason why the merchants of this country should not be permitted to do a business of that kind. Smokeless powder is not a secret. It is a question of ability to make it, and because we have reached a superior position in the art of manufacturing smokeless powder we are taking nothing, I should say, from the defense of this country by selling in times of peace this article to any other Government that might want it.

If we have achieved a superior position by reason of the possession of a superior powder and furnish the same powder to foreign countries, we destroy our advantage. We are no longer superior. We have traded our advantage for dollars. Every man knows that other Governments guard carefully many of their military secrets. The character of certain of their ordnance, the nature of their fortifications, the power of their explosives—all these and many more secrets are guarded as carefully as possible. If, in order to maintain a copartnership with a powder trust, we must expose the secrets of this Nation and have the results of all our efforts nullified by the sale of powder to foreign countries for profit to that trust, then we ought to abolish the partnership. Furthermore, we should enforce the criminal laws of the land and abolish the trust, root and branch.

This concern is, or recently was, a trust. It was held to be a trust or combination in the case of the United States against E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., decided in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of Delaware, on June 21, 1911. I do not know what it has done to purge itself, but I understand another case is pending. As to the latter statement I do not speak with definiteness. I have sent for the record. I do say to the Senate of the United States, however, that in my humble judgment when we stand here with a law prohibiting trusts and combinations in one hand and a contract with a convicted trust in the other, under which we pay it enormous profits, we are in an absurd and a pitiable condition before the world. We certify to all mankind that our denunciation of trusts and combinations is not in good faith. We furnish to the world evidence that we are pretending an enmity which does not exist. We feed the serpent that we have declared shall be destroyed. We pay it profits at the same moment we assert it to be an outlaw and a criminal. Nay, more, we pay a special tribute upon its monopolistic powers, for, having no other place to purchase, we purchase from it and pay it the profits that monopoly sees fit to extort.

I shall not close what I have to say without referring to one other statement. It has been argued here that the Government can fix the price of powder; that a Government board or Congress by law can fix the price. The inference was left very plain by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] that as the Government could do this, we could compel the powder company to sell to us at our price. It is true that upon interrogation he repudiated that intent.

Mr. President, it must be plain to everyone that at present the Government can not fix the price of powder. The Government can say that it will pay a certain price and no more, but it can not compel the manufacturer of powder to accept the price offered. It takes two to make a bargain, and until the two agree there is no bargain. If there were 10 or 20 or even 2 independent powder companies in actual rivalry, actually competing in the market, the Government then, by saying "We will pay this much and no more," might find some one of these sources of supply willing to furnish powder to the Government at the Government's price. When, however, the trust is the only place where the Government can buy powder, the trust is as powerful as the Government. The Government, forced on by its necessities, must have powder; and there being but one place from which it can obtain it, the proprietor of that place is in a position as powerful as is the position of the Government. He can say that he will close his mill and not furnish it at that price with as little loss to himself as the Government can say that it will sacrifice its interests by failing to buy at all.

The truth is that there is nothing more intolerable than that a government representing 90,000,000 people is at the mercy of an illegal and criminal combination, an outlaw of the commercial world. It is an intolerable thought that our supplies in time of war can be shut off by the mandate of one board of directors or by the decree of the proprietor of one concern, and that we may be obliged, in the face of an enemy, to stand without means of defense or to pay the tribute that one man holding a complete monopoly sees fit to exact.

Mr. President, I do not know whether this Republic will ever be engaged in a great war. I do know that although every morning we liberate at Washington a flock of peace doves, yet at the same time the harpies of war are nesting in the capitals of every nation of the earth. I do not know whether the newspaper account of this morning is true, but if true then the very arms we sought to prevent entering the port of Vera Cruz have been landed. But a few days have passed since the attempt to land these same arms was regarded as so serious an emergency that the President without waiting the action of Congress landed marines from our vessels. Then the emergency was regarded as sufficient to warrant the baptism of Mexican soil by the blood of the sons of the United States. Those arms have been now landed in another port of Mexico, while we stood supinely by without potency or protest.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, Admiral Badger's dispatch, which was sent down by the department, states that they were landed.

Mr. REED. I do not know whether it be true that that vessel was convoyed by a German man-of-war, but since the statement from the Senator from Massachusetts I can not doubt the fact that the arms are now in the hands of Mexican soldiers. But, sir, if it be true that while in the interest of humanity we were engaged in negotiations to bring about peace and order in Mexico an armed vessel of a foreign country was sent to convoy into a port a vessel laden with the very arms and munitions which our men died to keep out, then I say, instead of spending our time in dreaming that the sun of the millennium is about to rise, that the lion and the lamb will lie down together, and that peace and tranquillity are here forever to remain, we might as well awaken to the ugly truth that that country will hold its place among the nations of the earth which has the vessels of war and the armaments and the men to defend its rights. Confronted by conditions of this kind we ought not to hesitate as to the wisdom of building powder factories big enough so that we are not at the mercy of a trust that sells the finished product to nations that may be at war with us some day.

I do not believe war is coming; I do not think it will come; but the sight of a German man-of-war following the heels of a vessel laden to the guards with munitions of war about to be turned over to a man who has defied our Government, who has broken the rules of civilized warfare, and who has made himself so much an outcast he can not be recognized by our President, is not a pleasing one for the eyes of my imagination. The fact that the United States Government has not a navy yard big enough to build more than one ship in a year, and that the attempt is being made to starve that yard to death, and the fact that the superior powder wrought out by the genius not only of the Du Pont Co. but by that of our own Army and Navy officers and experts is being shipped to foreign countries does not set well upon my stomach. I believe in peace, I hope we shall always live in peace, but if we are to have peace, then in my opinion we must be prepared to demand and enforce our peace.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I interrupted the Senator I did not wish to be misunderstood in what I said. I read a dispatch, an official dispatch, from Admiral Badger, saying that the Ypiranga, the vessel which had been shut out from Vera Cruz, had landed her cargo of arms at Puerto Mexico, the port at the eastern terminus of the Tehuantepec road. I do not recall that anything was said in that dispatch about the German cruiser, though I heard the story that the German cruiser was there. I do not think the admiral said anything about the ship being convoyed by the German cruiser. There was absolutely no need of a convoy. The port of Puerto Mexico is just as open to the vessels of trade of other countries as the port of New York. We are not at war with Mexico. We are not blockading her ports. Those ports that we do not hold are, of course, open. I do not believe that any German cruiser was needed to get that vessel in. I am very sorry that she got in. The only way to have prevented it would have been to have taken the port.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. If the Senator will pardon me just one sentence—the statement in regard to the German vessel of war is contained in great detail in the morning papers. I qualified my statement clearly to show that I was basing what I had to say upon the assumed truth of that statement. The Senator from Massachusetts is very correct in limiting the statement with reference to the dispatch from the admiral, as he has stated.

Mr. LODGE. I quoted the official dispatch which I have. We can accept it as correct.

Mr. BORAH. Do I understand the Senator to say that the admiral in his dispatch made mention of a German vessel?

Mr. LODGE. I do not recall whether he did or not. I think it was merely a statement that this vessel had landed her cargo of arms at Puerto Mexico.

Mr. BORAH. I see no reason why she could not land her cargo of arms there if she desired to do so.

Mr. LODGE. None in the world.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, recurring to the amendment which is before the Senate, it reads as follows:

Naval proving ground, Indianhead, Md.: Toward extension of powder factory, $500,000.

There is an old saying in our language that is entitled to great respect and reflects the sentiment of our people: "Trust in God and keep your powder dry." That is a reverent saying, because it recognizes the overruling power of Providence; but at the same time it recognizes the self-protecting necessity under the laws of nature that is upon us mortal men.

One great point which seems to have escaped attention in this debate is the fact that in case of war there would be the utmost need for an expansion of the powder supply of this country far beyond the capacity of the present private manufacturers and of the present Government plant. This alone would justify the amendment, but the experience of the Government with the so-called Powder Trust has been an instructive one. Before the manufacture of powder by the Navy was commenced at Indianhead, on the Potomac, not far from the National Capital, the trust was charging the Government 83 cents a pound for smokeless powder. After that manufacture began and was conducted by the Government the charge was reduced by the trust to the present price of 53 cents a pound. The Secretary of the Navy advised me this morning that the manufacture can be conducted by the Navy of the best possible smokeless powder in the world at 38 cents a pound. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] says that with the overhead charges it is slightly over 41 cents a pound.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Would it interrupt the Senator? I have now the official dispatch, and I see there is nothing said about the German cruiser. It is from Admiral Badger, and he reports that the Tacoma, now cruising off Puerto Mexico, has reported to him that the Ypiranga discharged cargo all yesterday afternoon at the dock at Puerto Mexico. Admiral Badger adds:

No specific information regarding character cargo discharged, but there is every indication that the Ypiranga has landed her entire cargo of war material.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. My purpose in interrupting the Senator is to inquire what is the capacity of the Government factory at Indianhead?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I was just going on to state what that would amount to if this appropriation is passed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Before the matter is passed by I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Massachusetts who has just read an official dispatch from Admiral Badger.

Mr. LODGE. That is all I had seen.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator has given a great deal of attention to foreign matters generally, and I suppose to this question also. I should like to ask him if there was any occasion for a cruiser on the part of Germany or any other foreign nation to be used in the landing of arms and munitions at Puerto Mexico, in view of the fact, as published at least in the newspapers generally throughout the country, that not only had the administration taken no precaution to prevent the landing of all kinds of merchandise there, but had expressly instructed our military representatives there that trade with Tampico was to be free. A dispatch, or a statement purporting to be a dispatch has been printed verbatim in the newspapers from our administration to our representatives there expressly instructing them that they were not to interfere with the trade of that port.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me, it will only take a moment. There was no occasion for a cruiser of any foreign nation to be present to help a ship of that nation to land, and there would have been no right to prevent its landing. Puerto Mexico, in contemplation of law, is a peaceful port, open to the trade of all the world. There is no blockade, because a pacific blockade, if declared by us, would apply only to American and Mexican ships. It has been announced officially that we are not at war with Mexico. Therefore we can have no fleet blockade, which is an act of war. Therefore Puerto Mexico, like many other ports—like Salina Cruz, when ships landed arms the other day—is open to the peaceful commerce of all nations.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What I say is not in criticism of the administration, but I am simply discussing the actual status of affairs there. The Senator's remark that we could not prevent the landing of munitions of war there because we are not at war recalls the fact that we did prevent the landing of munitions of war at Vera Cruz, and we have the same power to do it at any other port.

Mr. LODGE. We could not do it unless we declared a blockade or took the town, as we did Vera Cruz.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes. We did not declare the blockade before proceeding.

Mr. LODGE. No; we took Vera Cruz; and if the arms had been landed we should have seized them in the customhouse. That is why it was done. It was to prevent the landing of the arms.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would the Senator point out the distinction, from the standpoint of the Government interests, between landing 15,000,000 rounds of cartridges at Puerto Mexico and landing them at Vera Cruz, to be used as effectively in the one case as in the other?

Mr. LODGE. Absolutely none.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We have the same right in one case as the other.

Mr. LODGE. Precisely.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Responding to the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], there is about $1,300,000 invested in the powder plant at Indianhead; and the statement of Admiral Strauss, in his testimony, is to the effect that this additional expenditure of $500,000 will more than double the output of that establishment and will make enough powder for the entire purposes of the United States Navy.

It is not the purpose of the Federal Government to make all its powder there. I read a memorandum early in the debate, direct from the Secretary of the Navy, to the effect that the Government, with the increase to this powder plant, will be able to make all the powder necessary for the Navy, but will not necessarily make it all, depending, of course, upon the prices of the powder concerns. The Government must have the whip hand in this matter.

Now, Mr. President, that is a simple statement of the whole story. There is no intention on the part of the Government for an exclusive Government manufacture of smokeless powder. There is no intention to drive out of this business the present men or firms who are engaged in the business, but the intention is to protect the interest and rights of the ultimate consumer—the Government of the United States.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] has stated that he was in favor of vast expenditure for the protection of the Government in the manufacture of ironclad battleships, armor plate, guns, and so forth, but that the greatness of the expense prevented the experiment to a large extent. In this case the size of the investment——

Mr. HUGHES. I would not interrupt the Senator except for the fact that he attributes to me a statement I did not make.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. That is what I understood the Senator to say. I will be glad to have the Senator correct what I say if I misrepresent him in any way.

Mr. HUGHES. I said that the Government of the United States could manufacture its armor plate. I was not saying anything about the largeness of the expenditure of money. I said I believed the Government should enter into the construction of battleships. I did not say anything about the largeness of the expenditure.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The point I bore especially in memory in reference to the remark of the Senator from New Jersey was that he objected to the necessary vastness of any effective expenditure for the protection of the Government by the ownership of defensive plants.

Now, in this case I should like to call the attention of the Senator particularly to that fact—that we have an opportunity without a vast expenditure, namely, with the very small expenditure of $500,000, to protect our Government from the monopoly of the powder concerns, a very small expenditure protecting our Government, developing the power of powder production in this country, and providing for the ultimate expression to the great investment that this country has in its naval forces, that ultimate expression being the powder, the firing force of the fleet.

Mr. President, we can not overestimate the importance of the powder question. We can not disregard in this particular case the comparatively small expenditure that will be necessary for the protection of the public. There is, furthermore, in this amendment an illustration that may excite some interest among those who are concerned about the trusts and monopolies in this country, because after a long governmental suit for an injunction, the suit of the United States v. E. I. Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co. (163 Fed. Rep., 127), referred to by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and a private suit between the companies that were engaged in this business on behalf of one alleged to have been injured by the powder combine, there comes this Government proposition, from one of the departments of the Government, of an enlarged protective experimental plant for the benefit of the Government itself. Now, here is a new economic proposition—a protective manufacturing plant, not necessarily to be used, but to be held in the hand of the Federal Government as a protecting agency for the Government itself as the ultimate consumer. It is, of course, a "horrible example" of power on the part of the Federal Government; no person interested in the "special interests" can tell where this "horrible example" will lead to and what it will ultimately result in, but it is highly significant that the experiment has thus far been successfully made and that it only requires $500,000 to make it apparently complete.

I trust that this honorable body will agree to adopt this amendment as an illustration of its own sentiment and its recognition of the sentiment of the country on this subject.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I have in my hand a most startling statement regarding this Gunpowder Trust between the Du Ponts and United Rheinisch Westphalian Gun Powder Mills, which, I think, it will be illuminating at this time to present. Amongst other things, I find this:

> The great German powder makers agreed not to "directly or indirectly sell or cause to be sold in any portion of the United States of America or in any other territory now or hereafter belonging to the United States of America any brown powder or nitrate of ammonia powder; and will not sell any brown powder or nitrate of ammonia powder with the intent that the same shall be used by the United States of America or in the United States of America or such territory."

I find, further, here that there is a complete compact between the Du Pont Co., the Powder Trust, which my colleague [Mr. HUGHES] stood here in such glorious form seemingly defending, and the German Government. The Du Ponts, however, had more. They also agreed that any improvements that might be made in formulas or in the manufacture of powder would be immediately imparted to the Germans. The United States working out the problem of smokeless powder at its torpedo stations had turned the information over to the Du Ponts, and the E. I. Du Pont de Nemours Powder Co. had privately agreed to reveal all those improvements to the German powder makers. Here, mind you, is the absolute wording of the contract, be it said to the eternal shame of anyone who would ally himself with any organization which would supply a foreign Government and constitute a menace to our rights and pretend to be an American. I can not understand it. The tenth article of this agreement is:

> Tenth. That any and every improvement upon said processes or either of them made by either of the parties hereto at any time hereafter shall forthwith be imparted to the other of the parties hereto.

The Du Ponts had paid still more for their monopoly. They had agreed to keep their German friends informed at all times of all powder furnished to the United States Government, stating in detail its quality and characteristics.

The thirteenth article declares:

> Thirteenth. That the parties of the second part (the Du Ponts) will, as soon as possible, inform the party of the first part (the Germans) of each and every contract for brown powder or nitrate of ammonia powder received by the parties of the second part from the Government of the United States or any other contracting party or parties, stating in detail quantity, price, time of delivery, and all of the requirements that the powder called for in such contract has to fulfill.

So the German Government are every hour of the day and every day of the year in possession of the quality of powder and the number of pounds of powder which we have in every magazine furnished by this harmless little trust, bowered up in the hilltops of my Commonwealth, be it said to our shame. I want to do all I can to strip it from power, even though there was not an ounce of powder to be used for other purposes. Let the Du Ponts and the trust go out and let the Government prevail. I shall vote for this amendment, and I would like to double the sum. Instead of half a million dollars, I would make it two millions and a half, annihilate them, and drive out this contemptible monopoly, which prospers under our shelter and our laws and the laws of the Commonwealth in which I live.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if no other Senator desires to discuss the amendment—and I hope that no one does——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana is very modest about it; but, although I shall only take a few moments, I hardly think I should be taken from the floor even by the appeal of the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. THORNTON. I recognize the right of the Senator from Wyoming and of every other Senator to speak on this subject as long as he pleases.

Mr. WARREN. I only wish to say a few words. The matter has been discussed too long already, I admit.

Mr. President, this is an economic question and one relating directly to the safety of our country in time of war, and it is one, as will be observed from the remarks which have been made, of wide sweep. Some would spend three or four million dollars for erection of powder manufactories; some would spend $500,000; some would spend enough to make all the powder we might need in case of war, which would be not three or four million dollars, but several times that sum.

Allusion has been made to the ships of other countries lately supplying one of the alleged peaceful nations, a nation with which it is claimed we are on a peace basis—Mexico—with powder and arms. Of course, so long as we maintain and insist that we are at peace with Mexico there is no legal reason why a foreign country should refrain from selling guns or powder or any other munitions or necessities of war to the Mexicans, although I may say to the credit of this Du Pont Co., or trust, that on simply the mere hint from the Secretary of the Navy that the department hoped they would not furnish powder to the Mexican Government, they refrained from entering into a large and profitable contract within the last few months.

It has been said here to-day over and over again that the Secretary of the Navy states that it will take only $500,000 to complete this plant, which will enable it to make all the powder required for the Navy. Of course, yielding to questions when asked, they admit that means only in time of peace. The testimony here of Admiral Strauss, who is the head of the Ordnance Bureau, and who speaks for the Navy, is that it will take $785,920 to put in the improvements which they require at this powder plant. It seems to me that this amendment, while probably not subject to a point of order, is an awkward one, because it states:

Naval proving ground, Indianhead, Md.: Toward extension of powder factory, $500,000.

Under that provision the department might contract for $20,000,000, and if they need only $500,000 or $785,920, I suggest to the Senator in charge of the bill, while I am not claiming that the amendment is or is not in order, it is certainly in bad shape when it provides "Toward extension of powder factory, $500,000," without placing any limit as to what that extension shall be. Under the evidence that is before us it will require $785,000. I would suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that before taking a vote on the amendment he amend it in some form so as to bring it within the ordinary terms of appropriations.

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask the Senator to state again the amendment which he would like to have inserted.

Mr. WARREN. The provision on page 26, in lines 14 and 15, reads:

Toward extension of powder factory, $500,000.

Mr. THORNTON. How would the Senator like to have that amended?

Mr. WARREN. It is not for me to say how I should like to have it amended.

Mr. THORNTON. Well, what would the Senator suggest?

Mr. WARREN. That provision is open at both ends, and there might be millions expended under it. It seems to me there should be some statement that it shall not exceed a certain sum.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, there would not be the slightest objection to putting in after the word "factory" the words "not exceeding $500,000."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, without stopping there at this time, but going on with the little I have to say, the Government has built two powder factories in the United States, one for the Army and one for the Navy. The Du Ponts have built three institutions for making smokeless powder, in order to furnish powder to the United States. They were furnishing all of it before the Government built its two factories. We therefore now have five different smokeless-powder plants. My idea would be, whether we enlarge the factory at Indianhead, as proposed, or not, to maintain these five different plants, separated sufficiently in location so that if one should be destroyed by explosion we might have the use of the others—this, of course, against the time of need, the time of war.

I was perhaps the first—in fact, I know I was the first in this body—to propose that we build a powder factory for the Army, so that we might be certain as to the quality of the powder furnished the Government and its cost and that we might have trained men in order, if we wanted to improve and enlarge the works, that we might be able to do so. The proposition was put before the Du Pont people, and our Government was furnished by them with all the information it needed, and with their cooperation rather than antagonism the plant was started.

As has been stated on the floor the price of powder has receded from 83 cents to 53 cents per pound. I do not know how much more it may recede. I know that a board, consisting of Gen. Crozier, perhaps Admiral Strauss, and other officers, decided that it cost the Government something over 40 cents a pound, as has been stated, to manufacture powder; but in figuring that, of course, they included nothing for taxes; they included nothing for extra compensation for the scientific work and the extraordinary services furnished by officers of the Army and Navy, nothing for advertisement or selling expenses, and so forth. Under all the circumstances they figured that a reasonable cost price for the Du Ponts would be about 49 cents. There has been a change since. The Du Ponts have brought out an improvement by which the alcohol which is employed as a solvent is made a second use of, and there is a probability that there will be a slight further recession of actual cost.

My idea of what should be done is that there should be a certain amount of powder made for the Army at its factory, a certain amount made for the Navy at the naval factory, and that we should enter into a contract each year sufficiently large to retain the works of the private producers, because, as I have said before, powder is contraband and we could not buy it from any nation on earth if we were at war.

Tremendous quantities of powder are used in war. What we use now in a year is hardly a flyspeck upon the wall compared to what would be used in time of actual war. A charge for a 14-inch gun consists of sacks of powder larger than a grain sack. Of course in time of peace we can buy powder from any nation, but if we should become involved in war no nation would sell us any.

It may be the better policy is, as has been stated here, to build the proposed addition to the factory at Indianhead as a club, and not for use; but if that club results in closing the private plants instead of reducing prices it may not seem so funny. If it is the judgment of the Senate that that is the better course—the "club" threat—I must be content; but even if it is now designed to build this addition to the Indianhead powder factory for "club" use only, and if we are to spend $800,000 on it, I am pretty sure that it will not be kept idle merely to serve the purposes of a club. It will be said, "So long as we have built the factory, we can manufacture powder more cheaply than can private individuals," and it will be used to manufacture powder. If it is used to its highest capacity, and the Army mill is used in the same way, and we will have no patronage to give to private powder manufacturing concerns in our own country, then, of course, we must do one of two things: We must build a factory large enough so that it can carry us through in time of war, or we must calculate to keep out of warlike entanglements and wait for powder, as we had to do in the little miniature war we had with Spain over Cuba.

It is an open story that as time went on, day after day and day after day, and Congress was demanding of the President that we should intervene and throw our arms around and help poor Cuba, we had no powder, and one of the men who is very much before the public now, and who was then in a somewhat minor position, used the authority, or rather the lack of authority but power of his position, to buy $50,000 worth of powder, as it is recorded, without law, appropriation, or order from his superiors. But war was soon on, and he was praised rather than criticized. Finally, after we had bought sufficient powder for a start and were in such a position that we would undertake this engagement, we made a contract with the Du Ponts for 5,000,000 pounds of the old-style powder at thirty-three and a fraction cents. The war did not last very long, and we found we were going to have more powder than we wanted. In the meantime the Du Ponts had, without any request from us, reduced the price 3½ cents, because one of the discoveries made had rendered it possible for them to make the powder much more cheaply. We then asked them what we should do about the two million and odd pounds of powder that we were about to have left. Our contract was binding, but the company said, "Never mind; we will cancel it"; and so they did. So that, with all the blackness you may paint against that company, its relations with the United States in connection with furnishing powder for the Army and Navy have been, evidently, if to the benefit of the Du Pont Co., certainly to the benefit of the Nation as well.

I believe there is but one way to handle this matter, whatever may be done with the amendment, and that is, if you can secure powder at a reasonable price—it may be at a little higher price than it will cost the Government to manufacture it—in some way to maintain the works that are now erected to make this particular smokeless powder of large grain to be used for the Navy. I take no stock in the plan to spend money enough to erect a plant sufficiently large to make all our own powder, whether in time of peace or in time of war. That may be economy from a narrow, immediate viewpoint, but it is not my idea of safe or final economy. It would be dangerous and foolhardy, and especially so at this particular time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming wishes to know what result is expected to be accomplished by the expenditure of this $500,000, I will say that the information will be found at page 473 of the hearings.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that I am perfectly familiar with that; and I will say another thing—I am obliged to the Senator for calling me to my feet—Gen. Crozier, who is at the head of the Ordnance Bureau of the Army, and Admiral Strauss, who is at the head of the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy, have always maintained, and maintain now, that we should not destroy competition by a Government monopoly. The House committee asked Admiral Strauss question after question all through the hearings about this; and while he believes we should enlarge the works, he has made it plain that we ought to buy some of our powder continuously outside of our own works. That is the safety of the matter. It was the plan when these works were started. The Navy works were started after the Army works. The plan under which the scheme was worked out was that with plants of our own we could get more favorable prices; we could maintain the quality of the powder; we could rework powder; but that safety required at all times that we should buy a certain quantity of powder from those who would manufacture it in this country in order to prevent the closing of private works or changing private smokeless-powder works into commercial powder works only.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I think the discussion of this amendment has demonstrated to all that it is a plain business proposition, and that great public good will come from carrying it into effect. I trust the Senate will readily come to that conclusion and signify it by agreeing to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask that the naval appropriation bill be now temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, that will be done.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 28, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father Almighty, out of whose substance we have our being and through whose providence we may pass from life unto life, toward that perfection for which we long as individuals and as a nation, may peace, joy, and happiness fill our cup to-day, and inspire us with brighter hopes for the morrow under the divine leadership of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ELECTION OF UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill S. 2860, relative to election of United States Senators, and move that the House do further insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the bill relative to the nomination and election of United States Senators and moves that the House do further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, the conference report already made by the conferees was agreed to by the House.

The SPEAKER. And the Senate rejected the conference, so it failed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the acceptance of the conference report by the House discharge the conferees?

The SPEAKER. That is true. The Chair is about to appoint the conferees, if the motion is agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. What is the action of the Senate? They disagreed to the action of the House and asked for a further conference?

The SPEAKER. That is the status of it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand it, the House, by amendment, provided that this bill should be operative only for three years, and both Senate and House conferees agreed to it. The Senate now disagrees to the conference report and asks for a conference. To what part of the conference report did they disagree?

Mr. RUCKER. The reason for the disagreement was on account of amendment No. 3, inserted in the bill by the House, and that amendment limited the life of the entire act to not exceeding three years. The fact of it is that the first section of the act ought to be permanent law; and the purpose of this conference now is to amend the amendment of the House, so as to exclude from that limitation section 1 of the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. But this is a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. It is privileged; that is true.

Mr. RUCKER. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not know about that. Mr. Speaker, I raise the question of order, that the House having agreed to the conference report that was a disposition of it, so far as the House was concerned, and that all matters that come after that in the House arise de novo, just as though the conference had not been had and as if there had been no conference committee appointed.

Mr. RUCKER. That is my idea, exactly.

Mr. BARTLETT. And therefore that bill is in the same position as if no conference had been had and the bill had not been sent to conference, so that it gains no position of privilege by reason of the fact of having a conference report here, because, so far as the status of the case now is concerned, there has never been any conference on this particular bill, and the bill stands simply as being reported to the House by the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress, ready for such action as the House sees fit to take.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Surely. I am not absolutely certain about the ground that I take.

Mr. MANN. I do not think the gentleman is right; but irrespective of that, this is a House Calendar bill with Senate amendments.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; it is a Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. It is a House Calendar bill. It was not a Union Calendar bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. In that sense the gentleman is, of course, correct.

Mr. MANN. When it came over here from the Senate with the disagreement it did not have to go to the Committee on the Election of President and Vice President. It is privileged.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; it was a Senate bill.

Mr. MANN. That is very true.

Mr. BARTLETT. It came over here and went to the Committee on the Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress and was reported by that committee.

Mr. MANN. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. And was reported by that committee and placed on the House Calendar as a Senate bill. A rule was obtained, and the bill was considered under that rule. The House put certain amendments on the bill, and it went to the Senate, and the Senate disagreed to the House amendments and asked for a conference.

Mr. MANN. But as soon as the House put amendments on the bill it came into a privileged status. There is nothing else to do with it except to take it off the Speaker's table. It can not be referred to a committee except by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt in the mind of the Chair about its being privileged. The only thing that might militate against its being privileged would be this special rule, and after reading the rule the Chair does not think that interferes with its privilege.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have five minutes, if the gentleman will grant it.

Mr. RUCKER. I have no objection on earth, if other gentlemen are willing to grant the gentleman the time. I yield the gentleman five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] now states this first section of the bill ought to be permanent law. As I understand it the Committee on Rules when it reported the bill to the House reported it with the understanding that an amendment was to go upon the bill providing it should only continue for three years. Now it is proposed by the gentleman from Missouri in the conference to yield to the Senate in its disagreement to this House amendment, and it is fair to state, Mr. Speaker, that many of those who had serious objections to this bill here did not press them because it was a report from the Committee on Rules giving it privilege with the understanding that this was to be a temporary measure.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I would like to say the gentleman is entirely correct, and I concur in his statement that that was one of the essential things agreed to before the rule was to be reported.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is my understanding.

Mr. MANN. Does my friend from Georgia think a private understanding of the Committee on Rules is binding upon the House of Representatives?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I do not; but, as I remember, when the rule was reported it was stated upon the floor of the House that certain amendments had been agreed to be put upon this bill before it was agreed to be reported. I do not understand there was any private understanding, and in pursuance of that agreement the House accepted that and the House is bound, or ought to be bound, by its action in the matter of putting this amendment on.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. I want to say the gentleman has stated the agreement just as it was. The understanding was this bill was to be a temporary expedient, and that an amendment was to be written into the bill before the Committee on Rules would report such a rule. It may not have been a written——

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman I never heard of it.

Mr. HENRY. If so, that is the only thing the gentleman has overlooked during this session.

Mr. MANN. I may overlook many private understandings.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, the action of the House ought to be binding upon the conferees. Here we have now my distinguished friend from Missouri coming to the House before the conferees are appointed saying that the chairman of the conferees believes that he will have to yield to the Senate, and this bill was gotten through the House with the vote of the House—I am not referring to an agreement, but I would be justified in referring to it—with that understanding, and the gentleman from Missouri now proposing to do this regardless of the action of the House. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe that Congress should now enter upon the making of laws for the election of United States Senators in the States. When the resolution to provide for the direct election of Senators was considered, the Democratic caucus refused to in any way take away from the States the right to regulate these elections; and three times the House voted down that proposition which proposed to take away from the States this right. Then the Bristow amendment was had in the Senate; and when it came to a determination of whether or not we should accept that amendment on the resolution for election of Senators by direct vote of the people, whether we should support a proposition which gave to Congress the absolute power to regulate and control the elections in the various States of United States Senators, as Congress had done from 1872 to 1894 the election of Congressmen, I saw my duty was plain, and in obedience to my convictions and duty to my people, I voted not again to restore to Congress the power to regulate elections, as had been done and attempted to be done by the Federal elections laws and the Lodge force bill, which were repealed by the first Democratic administration we had after 1860.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like a little more time.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I am not privileged to give any more time, because I am now being chastized for violating an agreement I made with my friend the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. BARTLETT. Very well.

Mr. RUCKER. I will not give the gentleman any more time to abuse me.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point there is no quorum present.

Mr. WEBB. I desire to say to the gentleman I do not control the time. I understand this bill is taken up under a privileged motion. I have no objection, so far as the committee is concerned, to the gentleman having five minutes more.

Mr. FOSTER rose.

Mr. RUCKER. Just a moment; I want to take care of this.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Illinois rise?

Mr. FOSTER. I want to ask that the gentleman be given five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, make it 10 minutes at least; it is a great question.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois only requested five minutes.

Mr. MANN. The time at present is in the control of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. It seems like the gentleman from Illinois, the Speaker, and the gentleman from Georgia have taken it away. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BARTLETT. I would like to have about seven minutes.

Mr. RUCKER. I yield the gentleman seven and a half minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized for seven and a half minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it may be that it is old-fashioned democracy not now so much revered and respected to stand up for State rights, especially in a matter of regulation and control of elections. It may be, Mr. Speaker, that we have arrived at that era when the members of a great party which stood for those rights in the various States from 1868 to 1894 and denounced in their State and national platforms control of elections by Federal authority may accept such doctrine. It may sound strange to new ears in this House. There was a day when great Democrats like Samuel J. Tilden, Thomas A. Hendricks, Vest, Voorhees, and a line of great men and Democrats, who will live in history as great statesmen and great Democrats, and who stood for this great right of the people, who will live as illustrious and distinguished statesmen and Democrats when those who now seek to destroy that for which they contended are justly forgotten. Mr. Speaker, I feel deeply about matters of this kind. I do not propose to vote for a bill or a measure that is the entering wedge to confer upon the Congress the right and the power to go into the States and not only regulate the time, places, and manner of holding elections, but finally to regulate the qualifications of voters, registration, and all sorts of things that were embraced in the infamous Lodge election bill of 1894, which was lost in the Senate by the heroism and the patriotic devotion of two or three Republicans like Stewart, of Nevada, Teller, of Colorado, and others.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. I doubt if the Members of the House understand the difference between yourself and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. Will you state succinctly what it is, so that we will know how to vote intelligently on the question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; if I have time.

Mr. WEBB. I think that is important.

Mr. BARTLETT. The point of difference is that I am opposed to Federal authority having anything to do with election of Senators and providing how they should be elected, except by the constitutional amendment that has been adopted. And while this is a mere innocent thing apparently, and simply provides for the time when Senators shall be elected, when you concede to Congress the policy of saying how we shall elect Senators, the next step will be to say——

Mr. WEBB. The point is made that it passed the House as a temporary measure, while the Senate has made it permanent.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman. The point is this: When this bill was considered in committee and came out of the Committee on Rules, there was carried out an express agreement that that bill should be considered as privileged, and that an amendment should be offered in this House limiting the existence of the law to three years. I was informed no rule would have been obtained unless the bill was to be amended. The House agreed to it. Now, the Senate disagreed to this report. That is the point upon which they disagreed. They desire to have it permanent, but I desire, if we are to have an invasion of the rights of the States, to have it for only three years, and not forever.

Gentlemen may think that this is a mere bogie man. But you are building, as did those men of old, a monster, calling it something in the interest of present necessity and emergency. When the time comes, and it will come shortly if Democrats forget their duty, that same monster will trample the life out of State sovereignty and State and local self-government, and it will be no time to cry aloud then upon the mountains to hide you, by pretending that you simply intended it to be temporary. It is but the advance step, and when you have taken it others will come in your place who will not consider it temporary. I do not know what the views of others are, but before I consent to do this, even at the dictation of anybody or at the request of anybody, I will surrender back to my constituents my commission and render them an account of the position I have always occupied upon this question without fear of their disapproval. Good faith, Mr. Speaker, good faith to this House requires that the conferees should not in advance go into the conference with the understanding that they are to agree with the Senate in the matter of voting out this most vital amendment put in by the unanimous voice of the House.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. In what respect is this first section vital to anybody in the world?

Mr. BARTLETT. Well, the gentleman has become so obsessed with the idea of having Congress do something, to take charge of the elections of Congressmen and Senators, that he does not see any harm in anything, though it be something that points directly to the heart of the existence of the State governments themselves.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman is talking to this amendment that this act shall expire by limitation within three years of the date of its approval. Have the House conferees receded from that amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT. No. The House conferees agreed to it, the House adopted that amendment, and when the conference report came up in the Senate the Senate disagreed to it and sent it back. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] says it ought not to be in there so far as the first section is concerned.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], when he reaches conference, will agree to the elimination of that amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not all of it. I will not say that.

Mr. MURDOCK. I have been following the gentleman from Georgia and want to be clear on the point.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to misstate the gentleman from Missouri. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have said all I desire to say now. If I had time I could say a great deal more. I feel deeply on the matter, and I submit that to agree to this thing as it is is but a step in the direction of concentrating all powers in Congress in matters of election, and we will see them fast approaching the point where we will have no States, but will have one great confederated republic here, controlled by Congress, and the States sinking to the plane of mere provinces. For one, I propose to stand where I have always stood, in opposition to measures of the kind. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, it seems that I am the most unfortunate of men. I have not been able in years to attempt the discharge of a public duty in response to overwhelming sentiment all over this land, even in the great State of Georgia——

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. RUCKER (continuing). That I did not arouse the gentleman's recollection of the past, cause him to have horrible nightmares and dreams and visions of Federal usurpation. Prudence admonishes me to stop here.

Mr. BARTLETT. Say what you please.

Mr. RUCKER. Oh, Mr. Speaker, I recognize the fact that I can say what I please, here or elsewhere, but I do not please to say anything to which the gentleman can take exception.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not mean it that way.

Mr. RUCKER. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I can not address the Chair or the gentleman either——

Mr. RUCKER. I yield.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not desire you to yield.

Mr. RUCKER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman knows how I love him and how highly I regard his patriotic sentiments.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that.

Mr. RUCKER. But, Mr. Speaker, it is the most marvelous thing in the world to me that a great statesman, the leading statesman from the South, the one man upon whom the welfare of this whole country devolves, the one man who alone must protect this great country from Federal-controlled elections and all their attendant evils, that this one gentleman should always be on the alert to oppose that which the people of his own State demand, and which I, in the discharge of a public duty, present to this House. It is true that in the Committee on Rules objection was made to the effect that the bill was not clear enough and did not definitely fix a period when this act should expire by limitation of law and no part of it become permanent law. I read the title and I read the bill, and I heard its provisions discussed, and I frankly admit I understood it was intended to be a temporary measure only, and when that question arose I did say I would offer an amendment in definite language, but I was not driven to it; I did it voluntarily. I did say that when the bill came before the House an amendment would be offered fixing a definite limitation of three years, so that at the end of that time the act would become a dead letter. I did that. I kept the faith. I have not deceived the gentleman or anybody else.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say the gentleman had.

Mr. RUCKER. But the gentleman speaks about having yielded—depending upon what I said here before the House and what he understood occurred in the committee room.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say the gentleman had yielded. I said the gentleman had not yielded; but the gentleman had stated on the floor of the House——

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; but the gentleman said, as I understood him, that I had agreed to offer an amendment to the bill, putting a limitation to its life, in order to get the rule, and that now I am going back on it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not say the gentleman had gone back on it. I said this, if the gentleman will permit——

Mr. RUCKER. I want to say——

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I said the gentleman had stated a few minutes ago that the first section ought to be permanent law.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes; I said that because, after reflection, that is my best judgment.

Mr. BARTLETT. And presuming from that statement that the gentleman would agree with the conferees of the Senate on that——

Mr. RUCKER. It is my purpose to agree, I will say to the gentleman frankly.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all I stated.

Mr. RUCKER. But the gentleman stated—I think I caught him correctly, because he always uses choice English, and I can always understand plain English such as he always uses—he did state that the House was induced to permit the first conference report to be agreed to by unanimous vote, relying on the promise I made. Let me say it may be that the gentleman is right and that everybody else is wrong, but within 24 hours of this time a distinguished gentleman elsewhere in this Capitol told me that the gentleman, with some display of feeling and passion, had said that they had slipped one over on him when he was not present and did not know anything about it, and that he did not intend to let them slip anything else over on him.

Mr. BARTLETT. I deny that I said that.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. To whom does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to both gentlemen.

Mr. HOWARD. I should just like to ask the gentleman, because I want to understand. I understand we passed this measure as an emergency or temporary measure.

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD. That at the expiration of three years this law would be of no force or effect.

Mr. RUCKER. I am going to discuss that in a few minutes.

Mr. HOWARD. Now, the Senate has seen proper to strike out that provision. I should like to ask the gentleman why they should make it a permanent act, when we intended to make it a temporary act?

Mr. RUCKER. I will try to make that clear to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I want to deny the statement that I said that they had slipped over anything on me. I never made any such statement as that. That imputes something to the gentleman from Missouri that I never have said, nor have I entertained any such view.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman can not impute it to the gentleman from Missouri, because I did not say the gentleman said it to me.

Mr. BARTLETT. I know. I say that would be imputing something to the gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. RUCKER. I accept the gentleman's statement without the least hesitation.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is all I want to say.

Mr. RUCKER. I repeat, I accept the gentleman's statement. I have found him always courageous, but most of the time wrong.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will let the RECORD speak as to that.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, if I am not right the gentleman from Georgia will correct me. My recollection is that the great State of Georgia was the very first State in the Union to ratify the seventeenth amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. It never ratified it, but refused to consider it.

Mr. RUCKER. Is that so?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The State of Georgia was the first State to elect a Senator by the people.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. The State is doing that?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; but the vote of the Legislature of Georgia was never cast for that amendment; never.

Mr. RUCKER. It was the first State to elect a Senator by the people under the recent amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. I believe so; yes.

Mr. RUCKER. Now, Mr. Speaker, why all this controversy? It is true, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], that when the conferees met we agreed practically to the bill as it passed the House, agreed to this particular section that we are now discussing, which is the limitation section. Senators of the United States, including the learned lawyer who drew the bill, accepted it without quibble or question; but when the Senate was asked to agree to the conference report, which contained section 3 in full just as the House passed it, the question was raised, "What are you going to do about electing United States Senators by the people hereafter?"

If this bill becomes a law as reported by the conference committee, it will make the entire law with reference to the election of Senators by the people a temporary law, and will compel Congress within three years, either now or later, to pass another law exactly like section 1 here; and who objects to it? Why, every time the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] has been elected and given a seat upon this floor, he has been elected in pursuance of a statute identically like this. The Constitution was held not to be self-enforcing, and in order to give it force and vitality in order to enable the States to elect their Representatives, Congress passed a law that Representatives should be elected every two years in all the States. Now, having adopted an amendment to the Constitution providing for popular election of Senators, it becomes absolutely imperative, unless we are going to abolish that other House of Congress, to enact the first section of this bill in order to put the Constitution which the people have ratified into force and give it effect, and that is all that this does or seeks to do.

The amendment of the House, section 3 of the bill, applied to the entire act; and when Senators discovered that that would put us in the nonsensical position of making this entire act temporary and therefore necessitating a bill hereafter to enact these very provisions into permanent law, they asked that we vacate proceedings under a former conference report and meet the Senate in conference again and modify section 3 so as to confine the limitation as to time to section 2 only. That is the section which authorizes temporarily the nomination and election of Senators, and it will become absolutely nugatory the very minute a State acts, and I believe the State of Georgia has acted, so this act can never become effective there.

No provision of this bill will ever be effective in Georgia except those of section 1, which merely put the constitutional amendment in force and authorizes the people there to elect their Senators. But there are States, many of them, where Senators are to be elected in the near future and where the legislatures will not convene until after the time fixed for election. This law should be passed in order to save the people of those States the great expense of convening their legislatures in extra session.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Does this particular act carry with it the effect of giving to Congress the power of fixing the time of holding elections for United States Senators if it should pass in the present form?

Mr. RUCKER. It does fix the time. It says Senators shall be elected at the general election at which Members of Congress are elected next before the senatorial term expires. It fixes the time in that way, and in that way only.

Mr. HOWARD. Was not the purpose of the act to pass some legislation giving power to hold an election and to fill a vacancy that might occur before the legislature could meet and pass a law?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, it seems that I have been unfortunate in my language. It is the judgment of gentlemen that until we pass a law putting the Constitution into effect it will not go into effect.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Did not the State of Georgia elect a Senator under the seventeenth amendment without the statute being enforced?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes; and so did the State of Maryland. I apologize to the gentleman from Missouri for interrupting him without his permission.

Mr. RUCKER. The gentleman from Georgia can do anything with or without my permission and not offend me. I know his genial nature—always in a happy mood—and anything that he might say I would accept as friendly advice and assistance. His criticisms I know are always friendly, because I know the gentleman reciprocates the great depth of love that I bear for him; hence I take no offense. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have no feeling about this matter at all, but it does seem illogical to have on the statute books a law authorizing the election of Members of this House and oppose having on the statute a law authorizing States to elect Members of the other House. The Constitution should be put in force; and that is all this bill seeks to do. It does not interfere with the sacred rights of any State. I will stand with the gentleman from Georgia or any other man to the limit of my capacity to preserve the States from Federal invasion; but I do not regard compliance with public will as a license for Federal invasion or as permitting such invasion. When the great body of the American people demand a reform, as it has for many years demanded the election of Senators by the people, the will of the people is more sacred to me than the dogma of State rights as advocated by some gentlemen whom I know. [Applause.]

But I believe that both State rights and Federal rights can be preserved. I believe the enjoyment of every right a State has can be secured; and I believe the rights of the great body of American people can be given voice in this country through appropriate legislation without sacrificing the tenets for which the learned gentleman so ably speaks and which has developed in our country the immortal characters he named.

Mr. Speaker, I hope, regardless of the attitude of my friend from Georgia—and I say it with feeling of the greatest kindness—that this House will do the right thing and send this bill back to conference. It is apparent—and everybody knows it—that we are going to pass a law like this. Then why not do so at this opportune time? Some gentleman on this side asked a question which I have not answered, and as I want to make myself clear, if I have not already done so, I will say that the proposition is to put the bill in conference again, so as to agree to an amendment of section 3 of the bill, which was put in by the House, so as to confine the limitations as to time to section 2 and leave section 1 as permanent law. I repeat that, in my judgment, this will not invade any fair theory or doctrine of State rights that can be imagined.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. If the law stands in section 1 as permanent law, will it affect the time or manner of the election of United States Senators in any State?

Mr. RUCKER. The section does fix the time.

M.. MURDOCK. Will that affect the existing custom in any State?

Mr. RUCKER. No; not in the least.

Mr. MURDOCK. In Mississippi and Louisiana Senators are chosen some years previous to their taking their seats.

Mr. RUCKER. This bill will affect those conditions, because section 1 provides that Senators shall be elected at "the regular election held in any State next preceding the expiration of the term for which any Senator was elected." So that hereafter the election of Senators will be held at the general election next preceding the expiration of the senatorial term.

Mr. MURDOCK. As it ought to be.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The cases referred to by the gentleman from Kansas are States where they have quadrennial elections.

Mr. RUCKER. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, one more word and I am done. I have no feeling in this matter. I have kept faith with the Committee on Rules and with the House. If the House does not want to pass a reasonable measure, let the House take the responsibility and turn it down. I have presented it to the House as best I could, not in passion, but deliberately, believing it ought to become law. If the House agrees with me and will send the bill back to conference, we will bring in a report as soon as possible and help make it law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield me three minutes?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I will yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, two years ago, after quite a contest in the House and in the country, the House adopted what was called a reform in the rules, and provided for the selection and afterwards for the election of the Committee on Rules wholly disconnected from the Speaker.

It was said in the old days, though not very truthfully, that in order to get a bill up before the House it was necessary to go hat in hand to the Speaker to obtain recognition; but under this reform system we now have a condition where one not only has to go hat in hand and on his knees to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], but one must agree in advance what he will put in his bill. In the old days, after the bill came before the House, it was left for the House to determine what it would enact into legislation; but now you have to prepare your amendments and submit them to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and see whether he will let you have the bill considered in the House under an agreement that you will insist, according to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], not only that the House will agree to the amendments but that you will make the Senate agree to them also. [Laughter and applause.] We are having a contest here now between two gentlemen as to whether faith is being kept, the Committee on Rules having held up, just as a highwayman does, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and insisted that he should offer and advocate an amendment to the bill before the Committee on Rules would allow him to have it considered in the House, and when the gentleman from Missouri offered the amendment and secured its adoption it is now charged that he is acting in ill faith because he does not hold up the Senate. We have never had such a proposition before the House at any time previously.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. HENRY. Does the gentleman not think the fact that the House has always sustained the Committee on Rules proves its patriotism and wisdom?

Mr. MANN. I do not. I never have known the Committee on Rules in my service in the House to be defeated on a vote. The party usually stands behind the Committee on Rules, whether the party agrees with it or disagrees with it, but that is the very reason why the Committee on Rules, when it has presented to it a proposition as to the consideration of a bill in the House, should not undertake to say what shall go in the bill as a condition precedent to letting the bill be considered in the House. The Committee on Rules, under the existing circumstances in the House, now controls what will take place in the House. There is no way of getting a bill up before the House unless it is privileged, except by unanimous consent or by a rule from the Committee on Rules, and the Committee on Rules will not report a rule, apparently, unless one will agree with the committee in advance what the bill shall contain. The House might as well adjourn and go home and leave only the gentleman from Texas here. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. If I have the time.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman did not say it, but he ought to have said it, that there is no way by which the House can discharge the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, that the House do further insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 81, noes 14.

So the motion was agreed to.

The Chair announced the following conferees: Mr. RUCKER, Mr. BROUSSARD, and Mr. AINEY.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the conferees on the part of the House be instructed to insist upon the amendments of the House to Senate bill 2860.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution is not in order, the conferees having been appointed.

Mr. BARTLETT. They can be instructed only after they are appointed.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they can be instructed only before they are appointed, and after the conference is agreed to.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I am wrong about it, very well.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is wrong.

The SPEAKER. What is the statement of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. Instructions to the conferees can only be made after the conference is ordered or agreed to, and before the conferees are appointed.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what was done in the deficiency bill, in reference to certain amendments that the Senate put upon that bill.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is in error. The motion was made to instruct the conferees after the conference was agreed to and before the conferees were appointed. We have agreed to the conference with the Senate, and we have named the conferees, and it has gone beyond the House.

The SPEAKER. The truth about the matter is that the Chair misled the gentleman from Georgia, and informed him the other way.

Mr. MANN. If that is the case, I will withdraw the point of order, for I have no desire to take advantage in any statement made by the Chair.

The SPEAKER. That is the status. The gentleman from Georgia asked the Chair and the Chair informed him that now was the time to make the motion.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I ought to have known what the rule is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were—ayes 37, noes 81.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Seven Members have risen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, before the roll is called, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 80, nays 191, answered "present" 11, not voting 151, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to withdraw my vote of "no" and be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HAY). A quorum is present, and the Doorkeeper will open the doors.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House agree to the request of the Senate for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill H. R. 13679, a bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 13679, the Agricultural appropriation bill, and agree to the request of the Senate for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the Speaker state the request was to ask for a conference or to agree to a conference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To agree to a conference.

Mr. MANN. It is an unusual thing, and I think a rather improper thing, for the Senate when it passes one of the annual appropriation bills to ask for a conference upon the passage of the bill. Sometimes when there is great urgency of some bills it might be quite proper to ask for a conference on the part of the House which last passes the bill, but it never was in conformity with parliamentary usage, and, so far as I recall, this is the first time where one of the annual appropriation bills having passed the House and then having passed the Senate the Senate has sent the bill back to the House at once insisting upon its amendments and asking for a conference.

Mr. LEVER and Mr. GARNER rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. To either fair charmer.

Mr. GARNER. Under the rules governing a conference the House asking for the conference has charge of the papers, and must act on the conference report, or it is usual to act on the conference committee report first. I say, under the rules governing conferences of the two Houses, the House asking for the conference has charge of the papers, as I understand it, and it is usual for them to act first on the report as it is made.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. The House that agrees to the conference acts first on the conference report.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. The gentleman lets very little escape him——

Mr. MANN. I know this session of Congress they have done this same thing before.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. At this session of Congress the District appropriation bill passed the House, and the Senate passed that bill, appointed conferees, and sent the bill to this House.

Mr. MANN. I think they did on one other bill at this session of Congress, but it is not a good custom.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the observation of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I confess that when I saw the Senate had asked for a conference on this bill I was greatly surprised, although, being no parliamentarian myself, I did not know but that they had the right to do it. But I understand, while it is not the custom, it is not beyond their right to do so, and I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that it is a bad practice. However, they have asked for the conference, and there seemed to be nothing else to do except for us to agree to it.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to object. I think it is beyond their right, but we can not raise that question in this House.

Mr. LEVER. That is very true.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from South Carolina what his request is? Is it to disagree to all the amendments of the Senate and agree to the conference asked by the Senate?

Mr. LEVER. No. The request is that the House agree to the conference asked for by the Senate on the Agricultural appropriation bill. The Senate passed the bill, sent it back to the House with its amendments, and asked for a conference. It is now the duty, I presume, of the House to agree to the conference, in order that we may get the bill into conference on the various amendments that have been offered.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Then, there is no request that we agree or disagree to their amendments?

Mr. LEVER. None whatever. The request is that we agree to the conference in order to have the opportunity to consider in conference all amendments as soon as possible.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. That course will expedite the consideration and the final passage of the bill, and therefore I have no objection. I realize the importance of enacting this great bill into law at the earliest date practicable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed the following conferees: Mr. LEVER, Mr. LEE of Georgia, and Mr. HAUGEN.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the antitrust bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on Tuesday the Clerk had read section 1. If there are no amendments——

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment as a new section following section 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding a new section, to be numbered section 1a, to follow immediately after section 1, page 20, as follows:

"SEC. 1a. That no firm, association, or corporation shall be subject to the provisions of sections 2, 4, and 8 of this act, unless by itself, or with one or more other corporations owned, operated, controlled, or organized in conjunction with it so as to constitute substantially a business unit, has an aggregate capital, including stocks and bonds issued and surplus owned, of not less than $5,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, one of the proper criticisms to sections 2, 4, and 8 is that it includes all small business concerns in its provisions. It is the contention of some of us on this side of the House that we should go to the full length and extent of our control over the large concerns, but should eliminate so far as we can any effort to annoy and burden and restrain the small concerns which possess no monopolistic power, and which, from a national viewpoint, do not affect the general interests of the country.

Now, that very proposition came up before the Committee on the Judiciary and it came up before the Interstate Commerce Committee as to what corporations should be brought under the control and regulation of the interstate trade commission.

I think when the bill was first drawn and introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the interstate trade bill, all concerns were brought under the control and regulation of that commission. And I for one, in speaking before the Interstate Commerce Committee, advocated that it should be amended so as not to include all concerns engaged in interstate commerce, and others advocated the same thing. And so when that bill was finally drawn it did not include all concerns or corporations engaged in interstate business. Therefore I have drawn this section, which in language practically corresponds with the language used in the Covington interstate trade bill.

I think it is wise that if we are entering upon a new policy in two directions, with two arms, interstate trade commission, and then the enactment of additional laws to bring these concerns under proper control, that they should go together, that these two sections should correspond in their jurisdiction over concerns exactly with those concerns that are brought under the interstate trade commission.

And so, having this conviction, having this conception, believing that especially at the start we ought to limit our restrictions of the larger concerns that possess monopolistic power, I have in good faith presented this amendment, bringing within these sections only the concerns that shall be brought under the interstate trade commission. I think it is a wise amendment and I hope the committee will adopt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, for the reason that we do not think that such amendment ought to be adopted. The fact is that our friend from Oklahoma has gotten the trade-commission idea in his head, and he seeks at every opportunity, and did in the committee, and I presume he will here, to inject some provision relating to the trade commission into this bill.

Now, in the first place, we do not think that there should be any limitation as to capitalization or surplus whatever as to sections 2, 3, or 8. We have provided limitations of this character in another section of the bill pertaining to interlocking directorates. Here he proposes to raise the limitation we have placed in that section and put a limitation of $5,000,000 in these particular sections. We have been endeavoring by these sections referred to to forbid certain wrongs that exist in our system, and we believe that any such amendment as that proposed by the gentleman from Oklahoma would tend largely to defeat the purposes of each of these sections. And therefore we oppose the amendment and hope the committee will vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall, either directly or indirectly, discriminate in price between different purchasers of commodities in the same or different sections or communities, which commodities are sold for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, with the purpose or intent to thereby destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent discrimination in price between purchasers of commodities on account of differences in the grade, quality, or quantity of the commodity sold, or that makes only due allowance for difference in the cost of transportation: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if we may come to some agreement as to the time to be consumed in discussing this section and amendments thereto.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think it would be better to let the debate proceed for a little while.

Mr. MANN. It is a little early yet to shut off debate. There are a number of amendments which gentlemen on this side desire to propose.

Mr. WEBB. There is no desire to shut off amendment.

Mr. MANN. I understand that. There are a number of amendments to be offered to this section. We will try to help the gentleman expedite the bill.

Mr. WEBB. I thank the gentleman. I will make no request at this time, Mr. Chairman, as to limiting debate.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM], a member of the committee. The Clerk will report the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 20, line 20, after the word "shall," insert the words "except in lawfully meeting competition."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask to have the amendment read again. We could not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. If there be no objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, on day before yesterday the gentlemen upon the other side invited us to present our views toward improving any of the terms or provisions of this bill. It is with that end in view that I offer this amendment, which, if adopted, would largely remove the objections to which this section of the proposed bill is now subject.

The great scope and purpose of our antitrust laws is to put down monopoly and restraint of trade and to foster and protect competition. As is pointed out in the minority report, this section as framed is calculated to limit and destroy competition. There certainly can be no objection, therefore, to writing the words of this amendment into this paragraph, so that no fetter or restraint will be put upon lawful competition.

It has been held in some of the cases that have been tried that wherever prices are cut below cost that is unfair trade practice; but where a man meets another's price in protecting his business in a district with a price it is his lawful right and privilege, and it is the object of competition that he should meet his price. The benefit of competition is supposed to flow to the public. That is the only way in which it can reach the consumer or the public. Now, if this clause is limited in this respect, it obviates many of these objections.

There is another difficulty, however, to which another amendment may be applied, and I will not speak of that at this time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we hope this amendment will not be adopted, because in our opinion it adds nothing to the section. We think under the provisions of the section any man who honestly meets competition is not thereby "intending to destroy or wrongfully injure any other person." If that is his object, meeting honest competition, this section will not hurt him, and we consider it useless to write into this section the amendment of my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM]. Therefore I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit an interrogation?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Is not one of our objects to avoid subjecting business men to the possibility of lawsuits and litigation? If you say that making a price to meet lawful competition is not within the prohibition of the bill, then why not write it into the body of the bill?

Mr. WEBB. My friend is a good lawyer, and he would not advise any client he has or ever will have that this section would reach the cases that he wishes to exempt, because any person who honestly meets competition for that purpose is not thereby intending to destroy or wrongfully injure any other person.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman permit one word further?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I simply desire to bring out my exact purpose in offering this amendment. There is nothing latent or hidden in it. I am simply endeavoring to improve the language of the bill, so as to carry out its purpose. I would certainly advise any client or business man who consulted me about the present language of the bill that it is fraught with great peril to him if he in a particular district is met by competition and cuts his prices there, and does not cut his prices in every other district wherever he trades. I should advise him that if he fails to do that he is committing an offense under this section.

Now, again, if a man cuts the price to meet a competitor, is he not open to prosecution under this section, because every man is presumed to intend the natural consequences of his acts? That is a legal axiom. Now, the natural consequence of my act in cutting a price to retain my business is either to take business from a competitor or to hold my own business, and under this language the question is left to the jury to say whether it was wrongfully done. Now, why should the business community be subjected to trial upon that issue, whether or not the act is wrongfully done?

Mr. WEBB. The case which my friend cites will never arise under this section. Everybody is given the right of self-defense, and if a man cuts his price to meet competition, and without any intent or purpose to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitor somewhere else, my friend knows there is no tribunal that would undertake to indict him under this section, because he is not acting with a wrongful intent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. When a jobber cuts his price, or gives a dating, for instance, or a discount which he does not give to the general public, in order to get business, does he not thereby intend to injure some other jobber, or some other dealer to whom he is not giving that preferential price?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; not necessarily.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why, necessarily. He is doing it for the purpose of not giving the same favor to the trade generally.

Mr. WEBB. If he gives that advantage to one jobber and not to another jobber under the same general conditions and thereby discriminates with intent to destroy, and so forth, he is liable to indictment under this act, and ought to be.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the very purpose with which business is to-day carried on, and your view would make it a criminal offense, and every large wholesaler would be subjected to a criminal prosecution under this present phraseology.

Mr. WEBB. He ought to be indicted if he cuts prices and discriminates therein for the purpose of destroying or wrongfully injuring a competitor.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not the morale of the business public generally.

Mr. WEBB. It is good business morals to-day, and ought to be enforced by law.

Mr. KENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. KENT. I would like to ask the gentleman if competition itself may not inherently be an injury?

Mr. WEBB. That depends upon the standpoint from which you view the matter. Some argue that it is and some argue to the contrary. Economists have not agreed on that question.

Mr. KENT. You intend to control a man's business, if you can, in order to prevent his injuring you.

Mr. WEBB. No; but this practice has been a favorite bludgeon used by the trusts—to go to a town and say I will sell these goods 20 or 30 per cent lower than our competitor sells them, and in that way put independents out of business in that community. I say if they do that they ought to be indicted.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. BARTON. We had an illustration recently where a big fire insurance company came into the State where local insurance companies have been doing business, not confined to the border of the State, and cut prices in that immediate locality until we had in three States 40 or 50 local companies put out of business, and then the price was put back where it was profitable to the company. Might not this same condition exist where we started a wholesale house in a State where their territory was confined to the State—might it not be a reduction of prices for putting that institution out of business?

Mr. WEBB. If the purpose is to wrongfully injure or destroy a competitor, this section will cover such practice; but insurance companies are not reached, as the Supreme Court has held that their contracts or policies are not interstate commerce.

Mr. BARTON. Is it not right that they should come within the law?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee whether it is intended to reach mail-order houses by this paragraph.

Mr. WEBB. It means to embrace everybody who operates in interstate commerce and discriminates in price for the purpose of destroying or wantonly injuring a competitor.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose a large mail-order house in Chicago was circularizing the country and should enter into competition with the crossroads store in the gentleman's county, would the department store, the mail-order house in Chicago, be liable to prosecution under this act?

Mr. WEBB. If it discriminated in prices for the purpose of destroying or wrongfully injuring such crossroad store, it would be guilty.

Mr. MOORE. And that is the purpose of the act?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose one large department store in Washington in the ordinary competition with smaller stores should on certain days of the week advertise that shoes would be sold at a reduced price, a price far below that at which shoes were sold in hundreds of smaller stores, would the passage of this act enable the smaller stores to prosecute the department store?

Mr. WEBB. I think it would be very hard in that case to prosecute the department store under the terms of the law. It would sell the same shoes to everybody at the same price, and it would be difficult to prove that it was being done to put the small competitor out of business.

Mr. MOORE. In the case of the department store advertising that on a certain day it will reduce the price of certain articles which would put several competitors out of business, this act would not apply in the interest of the small business man, would it?

Mr. WEBB. That would be wholly within the State and would not be affected by this act. It would not affect the Philadelphia or the New York department store if they sold within the confines of their State.

Mr. MOORE. The effect of the act, then, would not be to relieve the small dealer, but to permit the large concern, with its great capital and its fine advertising facilities, to invite and attract the public in large numbers, and thus put out of business the small competitor in a perfectly natural way.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman knows that the evil he is speaking of is within the State control. We can only handle transactions which affect interstate business.

Mr. MOORE. I grant that, if the business is wholly within the State, but you think your act would apply to the mail-order house that is circularizing the country and doing business in other States.

Mr. WEBB. It would.

Mr. MOORE. And houses in other States undertaking to do business in the gentleman's county.

Mr. WEBB. If it intended to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitor, it would.

Mr. MOORE. There would be no relief to the small dealer in the State jurisdiction, but there would be to the crossroads dealer in the gentleman's State, providing there was an interstate business. That is the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly; and you would have to go to the States for relief in the other case.

Mr. GARDNER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to ask a question of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. MOORE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARDNER. Would the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] open the door to the practices which you seek to prevent by section 2?

Mr. WEBB. It might be a suggestion to the parties that that could be done.

Mr. GARDNER. Is not the real reason for the gentleman's opposition to the amendment that you do not wish to have one line of the bill changed if you can help it?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir; that is not the case at all. We invite helpful amendments. I oppose this amendment because, as I said, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is useless and unnecessary.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. There are five amendments to be offered on this side, and, so far as I know, that is all that will be offered from this side to that section. Can we reach an agreement about debate?

Mr. WEBB. I hope that we may. I suggest a half an hour.

Mr. MANN. We want 25 minutes on this side.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman had better take some time for himself, for he will need it.

Mr. WEBB. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 50 minutes, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the other half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 50 minutes, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the other half by himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment which I desire to offer. Is it proper now?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. LEVY. But, Mr. Chairman, the Chair said that he would recognize me.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania is a member of the committee. The Chair understands the rule to be that members of the committee are entitled to preference. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York later. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 11, after the word "for," insert the words "difference in cost of production in different localities and for."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] three minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask the very serious and impartial consideration of this amendment by the committee which has this bill in charge. This amendment covers one of the conditions that perhaps inadvertently has been left out of the bill, and I really think ought to be inserted in it as a matter of fairness and justice. Everyone in this House knows that the cost of production varies in different localities, so that a price based on a single cost of production can not be maintained as a universal price. I have simply asked here that in line 11, after the words "allowance for," the words "difference in cost of production in different localities and for" be inserted. To allow for that difference is just as fair and reasonable as to allow for the difference in transportation, and I have received communications from business men calling attention to this fact and showing how it would work injuriously to them and their business if they were obliged to charge a uniform price. They can not do it; and yet the language of the section compels them to. Unless the committee is wedded, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] suggested, to putting this bill through the House line for line and word for word, without change, then I appeal to the reason and fairness of gentlemen of the committee to insert this amendment in this section of the bill.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take up the five minutes yielded to me on this amendment. I desire to say only a word. The exceptions in this statute are the usual exceptions in the statutes of the several States that have enacted legislation on this question.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean to say to this body that because certain language has been adopted in some State legislatures it is therefore binding upon us when a question of an amendment appeals to our reasoning and sense of justice?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Why, not at all.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Then why refer to State legislation?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. And I am surprised at the gentleman asking such a question. I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania because there is no necessity for it and there is no good reason for it. The place of production will be the point from which the cost of transportation would be reckoned.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this point.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. But it is pertinent to that statement.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Very well.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman know that a great many producers have plants located in different localities and that at each one of those plants, owing to local and other causes, the cost of production is different, and that each of those plants is for the purpose of supplying its own section of the country? Is not that a reason for this amendment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I understand that there is a difference in cost of production in different sections of the country, but we do not think that, in striking at the evil we are striking at, that element is serious enough to warrant us in putting in this exception. This provision is striking at a known evil, one of the worst evils that has ever been practiced in this country, to the detriment of manufacturers in different sections of the country, and we think when we have made the exceptions we have made here that we have gone far enough. We are striking at monopoly, at these powerful corporations that make a practice of discriminating in prices and in underselling in particular localities, and thereby absolutely destroying and putting out of business independent manufacturers all over the country. The object is to give opportunity to build up manufacturing industries in every section of the country and to enable men in different sections to build up new enterprises, and thus save communities and States and sections of the country the cost of transporting the same commodities from some central point in the United States to every part of the country.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman answer me how the adoption of this amendment would prevent the purpose that the gentleman has in mind, that of preventing monopoly? Why has the committee recognized difference in cost of transportation and yet refused to recognize difference in cost of production in different localities?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will explain to the gentleman that in drafting this bill we think we have placed in it all of the exceptions that are essential. This is a criminal statute. Certain elements must be proved and established beyond a reasonable doubt before any man can be convicted under its provisions. We are striking at a known stupendous evil, from which the people of every section of this country have suffered, and we do not desire to weaken the bill by placing additional exceptions into the provisions of the bill, and in that connection I desire to answer further suggestions made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the outset. There might be a thousand things, a hundred things, or twenty things not mentioned in these exceptions that would be a complete defense to a charge under this section, because in order to convict any man under the provisions of this section you must show two things: You must show that he is selling at discriminating prices in one locality, different from the prices at which he is selling in other localities, and you must show further that he is doing it with a wrongful purpose and intent to destroy or injure a competitor, either of the seller or of the purchaser.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. And there may be many things not mentioned in these exceptions that would completely exonerate the person charged with unlawful discrimination. In other words, no man could be convicted unless the criminal acts made necessary to constitute a crime in this provision are established.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. I would like to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WEBB. I yield one minute more to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania (continuing). Simply to bring the matter out clearly——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. There is no device in the amendment; it is apparent upon its face that it is perfectly fair. I would ask my learned colleague on the committee if this bill does not require from the producer to maintain a uniform price throughout the whole country wherever he operates? Now, is it fair, in relation to a commodity of such a kind, that it must be produced at different places and sold in the community adjacent thereto, and forming its environment, to put the burden on him of maintaining a uniform price everywhere when the cost of production in different localities varies? Now, you have allowed for the different cost of transportation, why do you not in equity and justice allow for this difference also?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not admit the gentleman's premise. The man might lower the price for any lawful purpose. It might be proper to meet the cost of transportation or any other purpose providing he did not have in his mind an evil purpose and intent of lowering the price to put out of business a competitor. That is my answer to the proposition.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Is there any more time to discuss the amendment on this important matter?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair states that the time to be devoted to this section and all amendments thereto is under the control of the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Minnesota by agreement in the committee.

Mr. MOORE. And we are restricted to such time as has been designated?

The CHAIRMAN. Those gentlemen have control of the time.

Mr. MOORE. I shall not consent to any further unanimous consents if there is to be such a limitation of time for debate on questions of this great importance to the people of this country.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVY. Do I understand that on my amendment which has been read I have no time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment has not been offered and read.

Mr. LEVY. Am I to be precluded from offering it and speaking on it?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have opportunity to offer his amendment, but with reference to the time for discussion the gentleman will have to obtain that from gentlemen who have control of the time.

Mr. LEVY. But they will not grant it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it ought to be suggested to the gentleman from New York that he ought to get time from one or the other of the men who have the time to yield. The gentleman was on his feet asking recognition, and I point out to the Chair that he was refused recognition because he was not a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has made that suggestion to the gentleman. The time is under the control of the gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman has not asked for time.

Mr. LEVY. I have.

Mr. WEBB. I beg the gentleman's pardon, he spoke to my colleague. After this amendment is voted on, or before this amendment is voted on, if the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] wishes to yield to Mr. MOORE time, he can still discuss this amendment, but we have finished with it on our side.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has already had five minutes.

Mr. LEVY. How about my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to know just what this amendment is, and I ask that it be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I have two amendments which I desire to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 20, line 20, between the words "indirectly" and "discriminate," insert the word "unreasonably."

Mr. WEBB. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by me is no more than fair and just. It has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States, and if the Supreme Court of the United States had not put in the word "reasonable" in the Sherman law about one-half of the business of the United States would have been compelled to close up. I say, again, it is no more than fair that the word "unreasonably" should be put in the bill. That is my view of it, as well as the people's. I think it is a great mistake to rush this question to such rapid conclusion. It is a question that ought to be seriously considered, as I conceive it is one of the most important bills that has been before the House of Representatives this session, and will require many years for its construction by the courts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, strike out lines 5 and 6 and the word "court," in line 7, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "by a fine not exceeding $1,000 for the first offense, and for the second and each succeeding offense by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, we do not want to declare all our citizens criminals before they are given an opportunity to have the law construed. If it is decided that they have violated the law, they should be punished by a fine for the first offense, and for a second and each succeeding offense it should be imprisonment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, lines 1, 2, and 3, after the word "thereby," strike out "destroy or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor of either such purchaser or seller" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "create a monopoly, hinder competition, or restrain trade."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen in charge of the bill have stated in the report that in preparing this section they had simply followed the provisions of laws which had already been enacted in some 19 States. This statement, however, is an error. The laws of the States to which reference is made in this connection in the report, with the exception of two or three, are not drawn upon similar lines to this section. In fact, the only ones that correspond substantially are those of Louisiana and Nebraska. Michigan has a somewhat similar statute with reference to petroleum products. The statutes of the other States are aimed simply at the evil of destroying or preventing competition or restraining trade. The restriction which is made in this section will apply whether there is any attempt at monopoly, whether there is any attempt to restrain trade, or whether there is any attempt to prevent competition. In order to so frame the section that business might not be prevented, framers of the bill have inserted a number of provisos which would not be necessary if the section was in proper form.

Now, let me illustrate how this section will apply in actual business. There is in my own town a small canning factory. I have no interest in it whatever myself. It manufactures probably a couple of million of cans of corn a year. It sells some of the product in my own State, in my own town, but the larger portion of it in States farther west, principally Colorado, Utah, and California. Necessarily it must make a different price in my own State than that which it makes in the States of Utah and California. The bill says it may do this provided this discrimination is based simply and solely on the cost of transportation. But they can not regulate the price in that manner, for the grade of corn they make there is a fairly uniform price in the States of Utah and California, and they must compete there with canners from the State of my friend from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON], who have a less rate of freight than this canning factory in my town would be able to obtain. Then, according to the proviso in the bill, if we change the price at all in Utah and California we would be obliged to fix it strictly in accordance with the rates of freight. If this is done, the canning company could not sell its products at all in those States.

The distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and also the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas, defining the acts to which this section applies, have said it was cases where there was an attempt to drive out a competitor by means of fixing a lower price in some particular locality than was fixed in another State. If that is correct, why not so provide in that section instead of using words to which nobody can give a definition? What do the words "wrongfully injure" mean? One gentleman says one thing, and another says another thing. Nobody has undertaken to define the term beyond this mere statement that has been made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD]. If they use the terms I have provided for in this amendment, "to create a monopoly, to hinder competition, or restrain trade," then they will have words that have been passed upon judicially and which business men are ready to act under, and which will require no provisos which will permit of loopholes and evasions by which the whole act can be rendered nugatory.

Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment ought to be accepted and adopted.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], I desire to state it is not contended that the verbiage of this section is the same as that included in all of the different State statutes; but our contention is that the principle, the wrong that we are attempting to correct by the provisions in section 2 of this bill, has become so notorious and so well known that 21 States have passed statutes preventing discrimination, following the same principle. Now, the gentleman proposes to weaken the effect of what we have written here by requiring it to apply only when the effort is made to create a monopoly.

We are dealing with interstate trade and commerce. If the purpose is to create a monopoly, the persons offending are violating the Sherman law; and at the risk of giving the court some trouble in construing the statute, and at the risk of giving a wrongdoer some trouble in construing the statute, we have proposed a statute here which we believe, if enacted into law, will be more effective than all the provisions of the Sherman law have ever been in suppressing one of the grossest and greatest wrongs in the business methods of the great and powerful corporations of this country. For that reason we hope that the House will not weaken this provision by adopting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, which has the exact wording of the provisions of some of the State statutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Surely the gentleman did not want to misstate my amendment. It covers not merely an attempt to create a monopoly, but anything that had the purpose to injure competition or restrain trade. Now, can the gentleman state anything that will be covered by this section as it is worded now that is not covered by my amendment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think so. I think it is more specific and more definite. Gentlemen complain of the difficulties of the business world on account of these provisions. I believe that in drafting statutes, and especially in drafting a criminal statute, we should make them so plain and specific that any man who reads can understand.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to ask the gentleman, in connection with what he has said, in line 11, page 21, what does the language of the bill mean by "difference in cost of transportation"? Do you mean the published rates, the rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, or not? What do you mean by "transportation" there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We mean the actual cost of transportation.

Mr. MURDOCK. Take the Standard Oil Co., and, as the gentleman knows, it owns great tank-line steamers and pipe lines which other people do not have the use of, and all manner of special means of transportation—are those included in this or not; or only the rates filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and no other rates, included in this line?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The rates of transportation, the cost of transportation, whatever it may be or by whatever means it may be incurred.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman said he wanted to be specific in the statute, and I was trying to find out.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, that is the way I understand it. Of course if a company has a pipe line of its own, the situation might be different.

Now, since the gentleman has mentioned the Standard Oil Co., the testimony in the great trial against the Standard Oil Co. has developed the fact that one of the very worst offenders that has ever existed in this country in this evil practice of unfair discrimination is that same Standard Oil Co.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman think he has reached them in that phrase?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We certainly do. We have reached the Standard Oil Co., and we have reached every other concern that comes within the purview of this particular provision.

Mr. HULINGS. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will.

Mr. HULINGS. I see, in line 10, page 21, that one of the exceptions is that discrimination can be made when there is a difference in the cost of the commodity. Now, does not that provision specifically provide that the big man will always have that discrimination in his favor, and if you allow that do not you make just an open road for big business to avoid the law?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am sorry my time has expired; I would like to answer the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 34, noes 42.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 1, transpose the word "thereby" and the word "to."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts a quarter of a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for 15 seconds.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, this is in order to avoid a split infinitive. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREEN], who is much more of a rhetorician than I am, tells me that we could never be relected in New England if we allowed——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman is from Massachusetts, a State of scholars, and we owe a great deal to its scholars, orators, and statesmen. Therefore, in order to avoid the calamity of a split infinitive, which the gentleman seeks to prevent, we will accept the gentleman's amendment. [Applause and laughter.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 2, strike out the words "or wrongfully injure the business of a competitor, of either such purchaser or seller" and insert in lieu thereof the word "competition."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for one minute.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, this is quite similar to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa, my colleague, Mr. GREEN. However, I think it is more clearly evident that this will be an extension of the rule rather than a limitation. Certainly the evident purpose of the section is to prevent the destruction of competition. If this amendment is adopted, the statute will read:

That any person engaged in commerce who shall, either directly or indirectly, discriminate in price * * * with the purpose or intent thereby to destroy competition, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

I submit to the gentleman from Arkansas that this language is much more comprehensive than the language in the bill, and very much less liable to meet with adverse construction by the courts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, lines 13 to 15, inclusive, after the word "customers," in line 14, strike out the comma, and in lines 14 and 15 strike out the words "except as provided in section 3 of this act" and insert in lieu thereof the following: In line 13, after the word "wares," the words "bituminous or semibituminous coal," and insert a period after the word "customers," in line 14.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I appeal particularly to the gentlemen who come from bituminous and semibituminous coal-producing States to consider carefully the amendment that I have just offered. The committee has stated that it is the purpose of section 2 to prevent one competitor from destroying or injuring another competitor. It has also been stated that its purpose is to control or prevent monopoly. I say to you gentlemen that, in my humble opinion, coming from a coal-producing State and knowing conditions in the bituminous coal fields, if this bill becomes a law as it is to-day, instead of destroying monopoly it will destroy competition and create monopoly.

You will notice that section 2 permits every man to prefer and select his own customers, except as provided in the last four lines:

That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

And in section 3 of this act it is provided that no operator or owner of a coal mine can "refuse arbitrarily" to sell, and so forth, and those words are limited by the words of section 2, which prevent him from selecting his own customers. And I want to say to you gentlemen who come from the great coal-producing States of the Union—I am not referring to anthracite coal, but to bituminous coal—that there is no monopoly of the coal business; that the production now is greater than the demand therefor; and that, notwithstanding the fact that freight rates, labor, and mine supplies have doubled in price, bituminous coal is selling as cheaply to-day, if not more cheaply, than it sold 8 or 10 years ago, and we in West Virginia are putting coal into New England and paying $2.10 a ton freight on it and selling it more cheaply than it is sold at the pit mouth at Cardiff, Wales.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman read the paragraph as it will read if amended?

Mr. AVIS. Will the gentleman give me time for that?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. AVIS. As it is now the language is—

That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

As amended it will read:

That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, bituminous or semibituminous coal, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers.

Gentlemen, there is no monopoly of the coal business, not nearly so much as there is of the timber and cotton business. As I say, competition is so great that in my State the mines are not running more than two and one-half days a week.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. What does the gentleman do with the last clause?—

Except as provided in section 3 of this act.

Mr. AVIS. I propose to strike out the words—

Except as provided in section 3 of this act.

In other words, to-day the competition is so great in the bituminous-coal industry——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman permit a suggestion there?

Mr. AVIS. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That relates to section 3. The language the gentleman complains of is in section 3.

Mr. AVIS. Yes; in sections 2 and 3.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It seems to me that the gentleman's exception ought to be in section 3.

Mr. AVIS. Except for this purpose, if the gentleman will permit me and give me a little further time to answer——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. I desire to answer the gentleman from Arkansas. The trouble with section 3 is that its purpose is to cover all minerals, even oil and gas. Now, by section 2 you prevent, or rather you limit or define the meaning of the words "refuse arbitrarily," in section 3, by saying, in effect, in section 2, that it is an arbitrary refusal to select one's own customers by a coal operator or a mine owner. Either that exception ought to be in section 2 or the words stricken out of that section that would cause any confusion if a question should be taken before the courts to decide what was intended. I hope that gentlemen who come from the great States of Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Indiana, Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, Alabama, Utah, Washington, and Wyoming and the other States engaged in the bituminous-coal industry will hesitate before they decline to adopt this amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, aside from whatever merits may be embodied in the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia, I desire to call his attention to the fact that there is nothing in the section he proposes to amend that in any way deals with the subject matter about which he complains. That is in section 3, and the effect of his amendment incorporated in section 2 would completely destroy section 3, and it seems to me that in order to reach the purpose desired by the gentleman this language which he proposes to strike out should remain intact in section 2, and whatever amendment he desires to incorporate in regard to mine products ought to be offered to section 3.

Mr. AVIS. I will say to the gentleman that if I thought that was a fact I would not ask to have it adopted here, or if you put the exception in section 3 it might cover the point, but how do you know that the House is going to do so? If you leave the words "except as provided in section 3 of this act" in section 2, and incorporate the amendment I propose in section 3, you would have two sections apparently conflicting. You would have one section excepting bituminous coal, and then you would have another providing that nothing herein contained shall prevent a person selecting his own customers, except as provided in section 3.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think I can make it clear that the gentleman's statement is not correct. It says that nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, and merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act. Now, if section 3 of the act did not exist, and if reference to that section is stricken out of the language in section 2, there would be nothing to prevent bituminous-coal operators from selecting their customers in section 2. The limitations are in section 3, and I insist in perfect good faith that the gentleman ought to offer his amendment to section 3, which deals with the products of mines and contains the provisions complained of.

Mr. AVIS. I appreciate the courtesy of the gentleman from Arkansas, but what is confusing to me is that if you put my amendment into section 3 it will apparently conflict with this language, that—nothing herein contained shall prevent persons * * * from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman's amendment is incorporated in section 3, it will relate back to section 2, and modify its provisions accordingly.

Mr. AVIS. The gentleman may be right, but I am afraid the meaning will be obscure. Will the gentleman accept my proposed amendment to section 3?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No; I could not afford to accept the amendment; but I think if the gentleman offers it in section 3, as I suggest, he will accomplish his purpose without in any way affecting or displacing the purpose of section 3 as to other products of mines. It is unnecessary to make any amendment to section 2, providing you can secure an amendment in section 3 excepting bituminous-coal products from the provisions of that section.

Mr. AVIS. The gentleman may be right—and I am inclined to think that he is—but, at the same time, I think that the language might be obscure and cause confusion.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, Mr. Chairman, we oppose the amendment, because we do not think it has any place in this section.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee a question. Does the word "commodities" in this section include everything that can be shipped, like live stock, live poultry, horses, mules, and so forth?

Mr. WEBB. I think so; why should it not?

Mr. SWITZER. There has been some query about it on this side.

Mr. MADDEN. Does it include coal?

Mr. WEBB. It would include coal except for the provision in section 3.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I desire in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] to read a few lines from a coal operator in my district—Mr. Edwin Jones, of Jackson, Ohio—relative to section 3. It is as follows:

I find the bill states that an operator can not arbitrarily refuse to sell such product to persons, firms, or corporations. As you quite well understand, occurrences are common wherein business firms are responsible financially, but oftentimes their business methods are such that you would not be desirous of doing business with them. Oftentimes mine owners have arrangements that have been in force for years, wherein they have given exclusive sale to certain jobbers of coal, and frequently we find cases where a man, firm, or corporation will be justly at that time entitled to credit, but that you had good reason on account of the habits of the man or individual in charge to believe that he could not continue to be successful.

Mr. Chairman, I think the criticism of this bill respecting this industry is well timed and should be considered before voting on section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out section 2 on page 20 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That any person engaged in commerce who shall discriminate in price, terms, or otherwise as between persons, sections, or communities, with intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure a competitor or to establish a monopoly or destroy or lessen competition in the production, manufacture, distribution, or sale of any such article, product, or commodity, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would like the attention of the other side to the provisions of this amendment. I want to call attention to the fact that section 2 prohibits but one thing—it prohibits simply discrimination in price. So far as this section is concerned, a man may be guilty of any other discrimination that would have the same effect in destroying competition, in injuring a competitor, or in injuring the public in any way, but yet it is not made unlawful under this section.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. For a question.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman knows that one of the great cereal food manufacturers of this country, when he sells a large amount of that cereal to one man, gives a certain number of boxes in addition as a premium. Is that practice reached in this section?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Certainly not, and that is one fact I wish to impress on that side of the House. In my first amendment the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] complained because I wanted to restrict the application of this section to the large concerns, and now I wonder what answer he will make to this amendment, which I have offered, because here I want to enlarge the language, and enlarge it so that it will comprehend and include practically all unfair discrimination. He will vote one down because it narrows and vote the other down because it broadens. In the end we get the same result. The language which I have inserted is so as to add to the words "discrimination in prices" the words "in terms or otherwise," so that it will include all unfair discrimination. Are you partial to one discrimination?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Does not the gentleman think his amendment is covered if this is done directly or indirectly? Does not that cover the very ground that the gentleman seeks to cover now?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. No; because "directly or indirectly" apply only to discrimination in price. Why should not it be unlawful for one to discriminate in terms? I hold here the report of the Commissioner of Corporations for 1913 upon the International Harvester Co. What does he show there? He shows that one of the most effective methods used in acquiring a monopolistic control in that great industry was by discrimination in terms. Notice what he says on page 35 of that report:

> In this connection there is large complaint that the company grants unusually long terms of credit to purchasers of some of these newer lines. One of the competitors of a company said, "The International Harvester Co. sells terms, not harrows."

One of the most effective methods of the International Harvester Co. was to give better terms than the independent and smaller concern could give, and the report of the Commissioner of Corporations shows that these dealers complain that the International Harvester Co. sold "terms and not harrows," and yet when you are legislating for the purpose of controlling and making unlawful the methods of the great concerns of the country, you say to them, "Go ahead and use all kind of discrimination in terms, use all kinds of unfair practices, use all kinds of disreputable methods in the interest of the big corporations, and so long as you do not discriminate directly or indirectly in price, you shall be free and untrammeled to go and devour the small concern and exact undue profits from the people by your excessive prices." I want to know whether the Members of that side of the House will vote against enlarging this section, so that you shall make other things unlawful.

Take the second proviso. It provides that only discrimination in price "for the purpose or intent of destroying or wrongfully injuring a competitor" shall be unlawful. You can discriminate for all other purposes, so long as you do not discriminate with the purpose of destroying or injuring a competitor.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I want to ask the gentleman whether his amendment does anything further, substantially, than to strike out the words "in price," because, as I heard it read, it strikes out the last two provisos of that section as well?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. I am in sympathy with the gentleman striking out the words "in price."

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I do not strike out "in price," but I add "in terms or otherwise."

Mr. GARDNER. I am in sympathy with that, but what about striking out the two provisos?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I had an object in that. I enlarged the section in this, because I make it unlawful not only to discriminate with the purpose of destroying a competitor, but with the purpose of establishing a monopoly or lessening or destroying competition. Why should you not enlarge it? It does not weaken the section if I leave the language which you use and add this other language. It does enlarge it. It may enable you to prosecute some large concern that you could not prosecute under this section as it is.

When I want to narrow one of these sections, you vote it down, because you do not want it narrowed; and when I want to broaden one so as to make it more comprehensive, you vote that down on that account.

I have left out that first proviso and also the second proviso, because when in one part of the section you prohibit the great concerns of this country from discriminating in price and then add a proviso that this shall not apply to any discrimination on account of grade, quality, or quantity, what have you done? You have opened the gates—not the eye of a needle, but the gates of a great highway—into which the trusts can enter. Why? Take the International Harvester Co. They have many brands of machinery, many kinds of harvesters, various classes of farm implements. The great concern may have one brand of goods to sell in Oklahoma and another to sell in Nebraska. They have the capital, they have the organization, and they have the financial backing. They can have all kinds of qualities and grades of goods. The small concern can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma) there were—ayes 30, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 21, line 11, after the word "transportation," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, can I have a minute on that? Is the time in such state that I can not explain my amendment?

Mr. MURDOCK. Or has all the time been exhausted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman——

Mr. WEBB. I will yield three minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. I will only take up a minute or so, probably not the entire three minutes. The present law provides, or at least the act——

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it. Does the gentleman from Washington yield?

Mr. MOORE. But I make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRYAN. Not unless it does not come out of the time yielded to me by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MOORE. It is a question as to whether the gentleman has any time.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I refuse to yield to the gentleman if that is the question.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the gentleman has no time under the agreement made some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yielded three minutes.

Mr. MOORE. I make the point of order the gentleman from North Carolina has no time to yield. There was an agreement that all discussion should cease at the end of a certain time.

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from North Carolina has seven minutes at his disposal.

Mr. MOORE. I beg pardon, if that is true.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think the gentleman ought to beg the pardon of the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. MOORE. I do, most profoundly.

Mr. BRYAN. It is granted. Mr. Chairman, the present terms of the Sherman antitrust law are such that the seller of goods making an attempt to select his customers and refusing to sell to all others, if such selection or discrimination be in restraint of trade, it is a violation of the law. But under this provision the seller can select his customer to the exclusion of all others, and it is legal whether it is in restraint of trade or not. I think that the only effect of this proviso in the bill is to give all parties an opportunity to name their customers where they are prohibited from doing so under the present law. For instance, this says—

That nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers.

What would prevent the paper manufacturers of this country from refusing to sell the Democratic Party publications paper? Suppose they would sell paper only to the Progressive and Republican papers. Suppose the shoe manufacturers of a particular locality would say they would not sell shoes to anybody except a certain set of people, the bakers refuse to sell bread to strikers, the butchers refuse to sell meat to members of the union. Under the present law that is absolutely prohibited if it is a selection or discrimination in restraint of trade, and in this bill such transactions are unconditionally protected.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRYAN. I yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Now, as we understand the proposition, under the present law things that the law prohibited are not authorized by any proviso. We leave the present law as it is, and this proviso simply does not undertake to make it an offense or fix a penalty under this particular provision of the statute.

Mr. BRYAN. Is the gentleman quite sure the court, in interpreting this provision as a substitute for the former statute, will not take this proviso——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Absolutely sure.

Mr. BRYAN (continuing). And say that this proviso governs in that particular matter? That the proviso is a part of the whole section, and where the main provisions of the section apply the proviso must follow?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The proviso does not authorize anything. When we insert a proviso applying to certain things we leave the law as to those things exactly as it is. If it is a violation of the law now, it will be a violation of the law after the enactment of the provision into law.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, why not agree to my amendment and strike out the proviso and let the law stand as it is if we are going to depend upon the law as it is?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. This provision if made a statute would then make them unlawful, and we would prohibit many things we do not desire to prohibit. We do not desire to disturb customs that are not wrong within themselves. We have said that throughout this debate. We are seeking to correct real wrongs; and where customs and practices appear to be proper and right, we do not propose to disturb them; and the effect of the gentleman's proviso would make the things mentioned in the exception unlawful that are not now unlawful under the Sherman law; and if any one of these things mentioned in the proviso are unlawful under the Sherman law, this does not repeal the Sherman law.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; but you prohibit certain things provided the seller may select his own customers, and so forth. Now, it seems to me you can not enforce your prohibition except under the stated terms of your proviso.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HARRISON). The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amenedment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 14, after the word "customers," insert "except when such act tends to create monopoly, destroy competition, restrain trade, or."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to debate the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment on page 20, line 20, to strike out the words "in price."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 20, in line 20, by striking out the words "in price."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, let us have a division on that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 46.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product for use, consumption, or resale within the United States or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and any person violating this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished as provided in the preceding section.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, it was suggested the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] is very much interested in this section, and he desires to leave, and if there is no objection I will ask that this section be passed until to-morrow.

Mr. AVIS. And that it will be taken up the first thing to-morrow, or some time to-morrow.

Mr. WEBB. The request is that we pass it over until to-morrow.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Chairman, I have got to go away to-morrow myself, and I desire very much to present an amendment to this section.

Mr. DECKER. Offer it and let it be pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to pass over this section until to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what disposition will you make affecting my amendment because of my being obliged to be absent to-morrow?

Mr. WEBB. So far as the committee can say, I will be glad to have you offer it now and have it pending.

Mr. MANN. Let me suggest to the gentleman that the section be read, and then the gentleman from Ohio offer his amendment, and let that be disposed of, and then the section be passed over.

Mr. BATHRICK. That is agreeable to me, Mr. Chairman. I offer the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all amendments be offered now.

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is desirable to have a half a dozen amendments offered at once.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina withdraw his request for unanimous consent?

Mr. WEBB. No, sir; but I postpone the request until the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] offers his amendment and speaks on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "mine," in lines 17 and 18, page 21, insert the words "or natural mineral deposit."

Mr. BATHRICK. Now, Mr. Chairman, as near as I can gather by any definition which I am able to find, the word "mine" does not cover an oil well. One of the most powerful means which the Standard Oil Co. has to carry on their monopoly is their power to refuse to sell the products of oil wells to independent refiners. Another means which they have to accomplish monopoly is to go into those oil sections where independent oil wells are located and temporarily, by very small sums on different occasions, overbid the price which independent refineries will pay for this oil. The result is that the independent oil companies are often thus encouraged to refuse to sell their oil to independent refineries. In this connection, reverting to section 2, I have thought that a discrimination in the price offered for a raw material could as well carry out an intent to destroy and wrongfully injure the business of a competitor as the discrimination in the price asked of purchasers. But that thought is aside from my amendment.

Now, this section as it is drawn, in my opinion, and with all respect to the committee for their careful and intelligent labors, to the purpose of preventing monopoly, leaves the door wide open for the Standard Oil Co. and others who own oil wells, which are not mines, to be exempt from this provision. And I say to the gentlemen of this House that if you intend to strike at the capsheaf monopoly of this country, the one which has formed the basis for most of the condemnation which has been directed toward monopoly, this section must be amended in some such respect as I have indicated.

As the Clerk has read, I propose to insert the words "or natural mineral deposit" after the word "mine," in lines 17 and 18 of section 3. Oil is a mineral, but an oil well is not a mine; and if we use the words "or natural mineral deposit" in the place that I have indicated I think there is no question whatever that we will cover the subject of oil.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I am inclined to think that there is something to what the gentleman says, and I am wondering whether it will be better to also insert the word "placer" or "lode." Now, there is a question of whether washing sand on the surface is not mining. There is also a question as to whether producing oil from an oil well is mining. In either event, it ought to be made clear, and the clause ought to have the word "transporter" in there, as well as the word "owner" and the word "operator."

Mr. BATHRICK. I wish to say further that I offered this amendment as it stands, with the knowledge that what the gentleman from Oklahoma says about placer mines is correct. I will also direct the attention of the committee to the fact that there is a strange sameness of prices asked of consumers of fertilizer. This product relies largely upon phosphate mines, but there is a large supply of phosphate rock dredged from rivers, and I doubt that these deposits would come under the definition of the word "mine," although phosphate, I think, is a derivative of phosphorus, which is an inorganic substance coming from the earth, and would be construed as a "mineral" as well as oil.

These matters I ask the committee to take into consideration. I expect to be absent to-morrow, and I trust some of the gentlemen on the floor of this House will take the matter up and see that that section is taken care of in these respects, if it should happen that I can not be here and no vote under the agreement can be had to-day.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] to offer an amendment. I believe that was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is not there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment pending, the Chair understands, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

Mr. GARDNER. I demand the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is to dispose of the amendment pending, offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if a vote is to be had on the amendment, I want to be heard on it. If this is to be laid aside, to be voted on to-morrow——

Mr. WEBB. I understood the agreement was that the vote thereon should go over until to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from North Carolina if that motion was put?

Mr. WEBB. The motion was not put.

Mr. FERRIS. You were asking for unanimous consent to pass that over until to-morrow?

Mr. WEBB. I did ask unanimous consent to withdraw, and I renew it, that amendments may be offered now and spoken to, and then allow the matter to go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] wants to go away, and so why not dispose of his amendment and then, unless other gentlemen insist, put the section over until to-morrow?

Mr. WEBB. It would be more agreeable to let this section go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has no objection to disposing of this particular amendment now, has he?

Mr. WEBB. There is no debate. We are ready to vote on this amendment now if the gentleman from Ohio desires.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not ready to vote on it.

Mr. MANN. How much more time is wanted on this amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from North Carolina will carry out the thought that he and the gentleman from Illinois had a moment ago, which was to let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] offer his amendment and make a speech on it, and then let the whole matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. He has offered his amendment and made his speech. Why does not the gentleman from Oklahoma answer the speech and let us vote on this amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. Because I have a lot of other amendments I want to offer to the section.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] be closed in five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Is that the gentleman's motion? Has the gentleman finished his motion?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] be voted on in five minutes and that the section then go over for amendment until to-morrow.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, why not put those requests separately?

Mr. GARDNER. Why should not the gentleman move to close debate in five minutes on the amendment?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to close debate in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the debate on this amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK] close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman from Ohio has already spoken and taken up the time. I presume, he desired to take up in support of his amendment. It is evident that a number of gentlemen want to speak on this proposition, as other gentlemen have risen. It is not fair to other gentlemen who desire to speak to close debate in five minutes.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that he move to close debate in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MOORE. I reserved the right to object, in the interest of other gentlemen who might desire time, but if the arrangement is satisfactory to them and the gentleman from Ohio I will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, if I could have my preference, I would willingly let this matter go over until to-morrow; but as that course is not desired, I may as well say what I have to say now. I will offer the amendments I have in mind to-morrow.

This section of the bill should undoubtedly be amended. On page 21, line 16, after the word "owner," there should be inserted a comma and the words "transporter, transportation companies, including pipe lines," so that you will catch the pipe lines. That is, roughly, amendment No. 1.

The second amendment that should be offered is along the line of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, which I am perfectly willing to support; but I think a better amendment would be, in line 18, page 21, after the word "any," to insert the words "including the products from placer or lode mines," so that you will be sure to take in the sands of the sea or rivers that are washed on the surface, from which mineral is obtained, which may or may not be a mine, under the strict construction of the term. One thing is certain, it is never an effort in vain to make certain that which is at best uncertain.

I am not at all sure that placer mining, under which oil is removed from the surface of the earth, can be considered to be a mine at all. It may be, but it is doubtful. There is a question whether or not under the commodity clause the pipe lines that carry it can be reached. The Commerce Court held the law declaring them carriers void, and the matter is now pending in the Supreme Court; and so far we can not get a decision out of the Supreme Court. We have been expecting it for a long time. This is the most important matter to the great oil industry of this country within my knowledge.

There should be another amendment to this section, which I will offer as soon as I get a chance, after the word "mine," in line 18, page 21, to insert the words "or hydroelectric water power or products produced by such power."

When the chairman of the committee explained this section in his initial speech he said that the well-grounded and competent reason for the adoption of a section similar to this with reference to mines was because the products of mines are a God-given treasure for all of us that should not be monopolized by any of us.

I thought his explanation, interpretation, and definition of it was a full, complete, and magnificent one; but can any living man on earth say that anything is so subject to monopoly as falling water? Can anybody say that one commodity over another is more God-given than falling water, which, dependent upon the topography of the country at a given point, is high and low at another point; and can anyone here or elsewhere justify the omission of water power from this section? No question is more important, few questions are more universal. It affects all of us. Water power lights American homes, streets, and cities. It runs our sewing machines, our automobiles, our vehicles, cooks our food, warms our homes, and every conceivable thing that electricity has been applied to in the last generation. Remember, gentlemen, that electricity is fairly in its infancy. Nobody knows what 50 years will bring to us in hydroelectric development, and no one can safeguard too well the water power of the country and prevent its getting into the hands of selfish monopoly that may torture all mankind as long as the human race exists. We ought to put in that restriction, and we ought to pass some other bills in relation to water power in this country. Approximately 12 per cent only of the water-power possibilities on the public lands of this country have been utilized so far. This House ought to make it possible to utilize the rest of that water power and put statutes onto the books which will enable us not only to lease water power for a short time but contain sufficient recapture clauses, so that we can bring it back and utilize it by the Government, or utilize it by local municipalities if they elect to take it over. Nothing is needed worse than cheap power and cheap illumination. This bill ought not to omit it. I hope the committee will be glad to accept it.

The committee has accomplished much good here, but this is too important to omit. It is not sufficient to leave out oil and water power. They are the two large questions of this day.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the gentleman from Oklahoma any plan whereby the remaining portion of this water power may be utilized?

Mr. FERRIS. I have. We have a bill on the calendar now. It is not reported yet, but it is authorized to be reported. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], of the Public Lands Committee, has been designated to write the report. It was introduced by me. It has the support of the conservative people of this country.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take it some one will have to harness the water before it can be made use of.

Mr. FERRIS. Very true; and we have furnished ample provision for that. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be adopted

Mr. WEBB. I want to say that when we drafted this section we intended that it should apply to oil. As there seems to be some doubt about it, the committee thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio makes it more certain, and I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment, because it is our intention to include oil as one of the products of mines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK].

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment again reported.

The Clerk read the amendment again, as follows:

After the word "mine," in line 17, and in 18, on page 21, insert the words "or natural mineral deposit."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now get in your request for unanimous consent.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that this section be passed for amendment to-morrow.

Mr. AVIS. Reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Were those words also inserted after the word "mine," in line 18?

The CHAIRMAN. Both amendments were read and adopted.

Mr. DECKER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the amendment read which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] for unanimous consent is pending.

Mr. WEBB. I withdraw that request in view of the fact that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER] says he can not be here to-morrow and would like to have his amendment offered and to speak five minutes on it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, in line 19, after the word "arbitrarily," insert the following:

"With the purpose or intent thereby to destroy or wrongfully injure the business of any person."

[Mr. DECKER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment is useless. What we really aim to punish under this section is the big operator who has millions of tons of coal and who arbitrarily refuses to sell to any but those he favors. Although I may go to him or you may go to him with the money and ask him to sell to us, he arbitrarily, capriciously, without any good reason whatever, refuses to sell his product, and we think he ought to be punished if he so refuses.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman know of a case of that kind in the United States?

Mr. WEBB. I do not recall one at present.

Mr. MADDEN. Neither does anybody else. It is mere nonsense and ought to be stricken out.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman from Illinois knew the high authority and the great men who favor this provision he perhaps would not make that statement.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What does it mean when it says "refuses arbitrarily to sell"? What does the word "arbitrarily" mean?

Mr. WEBB. It means without reason, without cause, capriciously.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman says "without cause." A man sells to one and he does not sell to another, because he does not like him, perhaps, and that is cause.

Mr. WEBB. That would be arbitrarily, I should say.

Mr. MANN. Does it mean sufficient cause, and if so, what is sufficient cause? Does the gentleman think that the courts would be able in 20 or 30 years to determine what this means?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; if they applied everyday common sense to it they would reach a conclusion very soon.

Mr. MANN. It would require more common sense than I possess or than is possessed by the gentleman from North Carolina, because he is not able to define it. What does "arbitrarily" mean? The definition the gentleman gave was "without cause."

Mr. WEBB. Yes; without reason or cause—capriciously.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman says that they are after the big operators; but suppose a man comes from Alaska with a big bag of gold dust or nuggets and some one offers to purchase it from him, by what right could he refuse to sell? He has it for sale for no other purpose whatever. This statute would compel him to sell it at the first proposition.

Mr. WEBB. If he got his price for it, he would be glad to be relieved of it, and if he did not get his price he need not sell, though I hardly think this section would apply to the case stated by the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. The statute does not say anything about big operators; it says "all operators."

Mr. WEBB. It is intended to apply to the monopolistic operators.

Mr. LEVY. Does this apply to the coal lands in Alaska?

Mr. WEBB. No; they are owned by the Government and are held for all the people. I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri will not be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DECKER].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all discussion on this section and amendments thereto go over until to-morrow morning.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the remaining discussion on this section and amendments thereto go over until to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

Mr. FERRIS. Is it the arrangement to take this up the first thing in the morning?

Mr. WEBB. We probably will.

Mr. MANN. Unless something is pending.

Mr. FERRIS. The first thing you do on this bill will be to take up this section?

Mr. WEBB. Unless something is pending.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina whether this unanimous consent implies that no new amendments will be offered?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. GARDNER. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any person engaged in commerce who shall lease or make a sale of goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities for use, consumption, or resale within the United States, or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price, on the condition or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 14, insert, after the word "seller," the following:

"With the intent of obtaining or establishing a monopoly or of destroying the business of a competitor."

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I notice in the report of the committee on this bill, on page 11, the following:

Section 4 of this bill has apparently been much misunderstood, and great confusion seems to have arisen in regard to its provisions. Whether designedly or from a misunderstanding of its purport we know not, but it has been contended very earnestly that its provisions prevent exclusive or sole agencies.

I do not know in whose mind any confusion has or ought to have existed in regard to the question of exactly what this section does mean. Before proceeding with what I have to say I want to ask the members of the committee, when those who are in opposition to this amendment are heard, not to allow any red herring to be drawn across the scent and not to permit the matter to become mixed with this question of leases, because if they do, then they will have argued before the committee not the amendment which I propose, but they will have to go all over the question of the United Shoe Machinery Co.'s tying leases. I am just as much opposed to those as anybody can be. I do not propose by this amendment to permit that thing to be done, and I ask the committee to keep their minds on just the one proposition.

Nobody has maintained in support of this section that it had for its purpose the prohibition of what is known as an agency; that is, a straightaway agency, where there is simply the question of principal on one side and agent on the other. The committee itself says that it is not intended to do away with that sort of thing, and the absurdity of their position in that respect I hope to be able to demonstrate. In other words, the committee says that anybody, any manufacturer or producer, no matter who he is, can have just as many strict agencies as he wants to have. They can be agents who have roofs over their heads, or they can be commercial travelers, traveling throughout the country—that they do not seek to prevent that in any way, but that what they do seek to prevent is the making of contracts to create what are known as sole selling agencies. I do not know how much explanation is necessary in order to show what a so-called sole selling agency is. It has come to have a sort of technical meaning. Of course the number of contracts which can be executed, and by which sole selling agencies, so called, are created, can be infinite in their variety, but the main gist of a sole selling agency contract—and that is the thing which the committee seeks to hit—is a contract by which the man who has a thing to sell undertakes to give an exclusive territory to an agent, and on the other hand undertakes to bind that agent not to sell in that territory any of the goods of a competitor. I want to call the attention of the committee to this fact. I presume they know this much of it, that the Committee on the Judiciary did have hearings in regard to these trust bills, tentative and otherwise. I do not know how many pages of testimony were taken, but a great many pages. I do not claim to have read all of the testimony. I have not, in fact, read it all, nor have I heard it all, but I have, so far as I have had the time, gone through the hearings, and have had in mind what was said when I was present at the hearings, and I believe, although I may be to some degree mistaken, that no member of the committee can point out any objection made by any man who appeared before our committee to these technical sole selling agencies. So far as I have been able to discover anything in the hearings, it will be found at page 140, and I call attention to the fact that it is the testimony of Mr. J. B. Moorehead, of Lexington, Mo., who was the national secretary of the Retail Merchants' Association of the United States.

It is obvious that if there is any harm to be remedied, if any harm has been done to the retail merchants of the country by permitting these sole selling agencies, the secretary of this association would have pointed it out. Let us take it up from the point of view of these retail merchants. I desire to call attention to the fact that the witness is now testifying about one of these so-called tentative bills, and I read from his testimony:

Mr. CARLIN. Do you not think that section 10 of bill No. 1 would give you some relief?

Mr. MOOREHEAD. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. CARLIN. I will read the language of that section to you:

"That it shall be deemed an attempt to monopolize trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations or a part thereof for any persons in interstate or foreign commerce to make a sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, or fix a price charged therefor or discount from or rebate upon such price, on the condition or understanding that the purchaser thereof shall not deal in goods, wares, or merchandise of a competitor or competitors of the seller."

Mr. MOOREHEAD. I am not up on forms of law. I do not know whether that would cover the case or not.

Mr. CARLIN. The intention is to liberate the retailer and give him a right to sell anybody's goods he wants to sell and to prevent a contract which would require him to sell exclusively a particular line of goods.

Mr. MOOREHEAD. That may be the difficulty of some lines of retailing, but that is only incidental to the great problem.

The business that is big enough, the aggregation of capital that is big enough to say to the manufacturer: "You sell us your product at such a price. If you do not do it, we will manufacture that product ourselves." That is the main thing. And what is the result?

Mr. CARLIN. You do not catch the idea of this section. The idea is that the manufacturer shall not say to any one man that he shall sell the particular line of goods of that particular manufacturer exclusively. It liberates the retailer. It liberates the retailer from that situation and allows him to buy goods of anybody he wants to and sell them in his store.

Mr. MOOREHEAD. I think that may be all right, but where that might be relevant to one case, there would be hundreds of cases that would not be on that line.

Mr. CARLIN. I am calling your attention to that one thing now, and ask you whether you do not think that would be helpful?

Mr. MOOREHEAD. I see no objection to it now.

That is not to be compared to the big question. Here is the proposition: As I started to say, the manufacturer may be intimidated to sell his goods to a large distributor by having it said to him, "You must sell us these goods at such a price, or we will make them ourselves." What is the result? The big buyer gets the goods at cost, and that gives him a tremendous advantage over the little fellow.

That is all my colleague on the committee could get out of the retailer. So apparently the retailer is not damaged in any way by the making of these sole selling agency contracts.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McCOY. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER. In the report Mr. Clayton says in his report that this section "not only does not prohibit or forbid exclusive agencies," and so forth, and the gentleman uses the term "sole selling agencies." Many of us do not understand the difference.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, as I stated in the beginning, this bill does not undertake to forbid contracts creating a strict agency, where the agent is a strict agent, and the man on the other side is a strict principal, and I see that I have failed to make the question of a sole selling agency clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes further.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I hope that he will be granted this time, because there is a great deal that will need elucidation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, by his suggestion, reminds me that I did not complete the explanation of what a sole selling agency is. It involves not only this creation of an exclusive territory, in which the principal will sell only to one person and in which the so-called agent will deal only in the goods of that person, but the so-called agent buys the goods from the principal. That is what is technically known as a sole selling agency.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. It would not prevent the sole selling agent from having a sole selling agency for another class of goods that were not in competition?

Mr. McCOY. Not at all; but simply the one particular kind of goods that the principal is making.

Mr. MADDEN. He could have as many sole selling agencies as he could handle without any conflict with the other in competition.

Mr. McCOY. As many as he could possibly handle. It only relates to one thing or perhaps two or three other things that the principal is making.

Mr. GARDNER. Even yet I do not understand. Now, apparently section 4 forbids any person to make a sale of goods on condition that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods of a competitor.

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Now, the report says that this provision is not intended to prevent exclusive agencies. The gentleman, I take it, is contending, however, that the provision does, as a matter of fact, prevent sole selling agencies.

Mr. McCOY. Where the so-called agent buys the goods?

Mr. GARDNER. Where the so-called agent buys the goods; and the gentleman's amendment is intended to permit them——

Mr. McCOY. No; my amendment is aimed simply at—I will read the amendment. It is to leave the section as it stands and forbids that kind of thing. It is to amend the section so as to permit that sort of contract to be made where it is not made with the intent to obtain or establish a monopoly or to destroy the business of a competitor.

Mr. GARDNER. That is what I understand. What I was going to say was that the gentleman's amendment is designed to permit sole selling agencies where the agent buys the goods, provided the transaction is not engaged in for the purpose of restraining trade or creating a monopoly. Is that correct?

Mr. McCOY. That is correct.

Mr. GARDNER. May I ask the gentleman how he interprets these words: "or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price"? What is the need of those words if you forbid the sale of goods.

Mr. McCOY. I do not think they add anything; but the committee itself says, at page 11 of the report, that the words "or fix a price charged therefor, or discount therefrom, or rebate upon such price," are merely descriptive of the different methods used by the manufacturers to induce the dealer or local merchant to enter into this exclusive or tying contract.

Mr. GARDNER. That is all very well; but the report goes on and explains that "the first inducement in every case must of necessity relate to price." Now, suppose it was found that one of these exclusive agents or exclusive purchasers had created a restraint of trade by some device other than the fixation of prices or rebates; might not a court hold that the very inclusion of those words, which the committee says are descriptive, had by implication legalized the use of other methods of discrimination?

Mr. McCOY. I would say to the gentleman from Massachusetts I would rather not discuss that proposition now. The gentleman may be right about it, but I would like simply to take up this question of my amendment.

Mr. GARDNER. I want to get it clear in my mind in connection with the other.

Mr. McCOY. I do not know but that the gentleman is right; but I have not considered that end of it. Now, the committee in its report says that the provision of section 4 "is designed merely to prevent this unfair trade practice, now so common throughout the country, and which is generally regarded by everyone who has given the subject any serious consideration as unjust to the local dealer and to the community and as monopolistic in its effect."

Now, I will call the attention of the committee to what are the facts in regard to the community at large, and who fail to say at any rate in regard to these hearings where they had an opportunity to do. Now, then, let us see what this does. For instance, we have a great many manufacturers of machine tools. Those are these big tools we see in the various machine shops in the country, and I do not need to describe them; I do not need to tell you how bulky they are. They look expensive and they are expensive. Now, these manufacturers of machine tools all make these exclusive selling agencies. They do it for this reason: They are not a trust; they are not combined together in any way to stifle competition. Some of them are not big. There is one in my district, a very small concern, comparatively. Now, if it had to carry a stock of these expensive machine tools all over the United States, wherever they naturally would be in the hands of the ordinary agent—that is, the principal retaining the title and simply turning them over to the agent for sale—do not you see, can not anybody see, that unless they have enormous resources they can not afford to do that sort of thing, and that is the very cause leading to these sole selling agents.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. The very thing the gentleman complains of would prevent anybody starting any new business.

Mr. McCOY. Surely; and I am coming to that. Now, what is the consideration which moves the so-called agent to go into this matter and put up his money? Why it is, of course, that he would get a better price for the machines than he could get otherwise, and it is perfectly natural, because he puts up the money, and he should have a better price than if the machines were sold outright to somebody who did not want to put up the money to carry these goods but wanted them for actual use. In other words, the manufacturer with a small capital goes substantially into a partnership with the agent who is to handle these goods. The manufacturers say, "I will not sell or allow anybody else to sell in that territory." The agent says, "On account of these prices which you have given to me, I will not sell the goods to anybody else."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman inform the committee whether these many business houses who have the exclusive selling contracts are protesting against the character of that form of business dealings?

Mr. McCOY. I have protests from everywhere about it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are they protesting against the character of the contracts?

Mr. McCOY. You mean the people who make the contracts?

Mr. STAFFORD. The persons who make them and the business houses who are the recipients of the contracts.

Mr. McCOY. Not at all. I understand that all the automobile people carry on their business in that way. Let us suppose, for the sake of——

Mr. STAFFORD. And there is the office-furniture business—the Yawman & Erbe, the Shaw-Walker concerns, and any number of other manufacturers that have exclusive contracts for dispensing their wares.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McCOY. The gentleman asks whether these agents, for whom the committee rather tries to arouse our sympathies, are taking these contracts by having them forced onto them by the manufacturers. I think a little imagination should answer that question. All the automobile concerns, I believe, have these sole selling agency contracts. Now, let us suppose that every one of these agents in the city of Washington should die tomorrow. Do you believe that the automobile manufacturers would have to chase to Washington to get agents? Detroit would be filled with Washingtonians wanting to get these contracts.

The argument made by one of the members of the committee, who principally supports this proposition, is this, that it is unfair that a man should first sell his goods and then exact from the man to whom he has sold them a contract that he will not sell anybody else's goods. Now, the proposition eats itself. One does not first sell the goods and then exact something from that man. He could not do it. If he sold the goods without any form of contract except as to sale and delivery, that would be the end of it. But the contract on the one hand to sell and the contract on the other hand not to sell is a mutual agreement which both of them are perfecly willing to enter into.

Now, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] has suggested something about somebody going into business. Let us take a couple of young men who have some article for sale which they think is a pretty good article. They think that if it could be properly placed it would have a big sale. They have a small capital. What are they going to do? They can not hire agents, commercial travelers, and send them all over the country. They can not establish agencies all over the country. The only thing they can do, and I believe every lawyer here has known plenty of cases of that kind, is to get somebody who will take one of these sole selling agencies, and who will give his attention to their business and build up a trade for the little man.

Mr. MURDOCK. Now, right there, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCOY. Surely.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does not the argument the gentleman is making put upon the new corporation or new company the necessity of establishing a finely articulated retail business all over the United States, which is the very trouble the committee is trying to reach, thereby shutting out the new man from the retail trade by exclusive contracts?

Mr. McCOY. I do not quite understand the gentleman. Do you mean the committee is endeavoring to remedy by this provision the cessation of retail business?

Mr. MURDOCK. No. The committee is trying to give the new man a chance to get his wares out to the public through existing retail agencies. And does not the gentleman's proposition cut the new firm out of that opportunity?

Mr. McCOY. No. It does not cut them out of the opportunity. The bill cuts them out of the opportunity. It provides that the man who has, for instance, a small invention and wants to market it—it prevents a man who wants to get into any kind of business, without a great amount of capital, from being able to do that. Now, here is one thing the committee does claim, and it is along the line of a suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas. They claim that by creating an agency in a small place and making the so-called agent agree not to sell the goods it throws the community over into the hands of the mail-order houses. On the other hand, they argue that people go to the mail-order stores because of this sole selling agency there, and the result of their going is to destroy this retailer who takes this sole order agency. Again, one argument eats the other.

Mr. MADDEN. How can you stop a mail-order man doing that, except by taking his postal privileges away from him?

Mr. McCOY. You can not. But here is what you can do: If a manufacturer has one of these sole selling agencies, he will not permit the mail-order house to sell in that district in competition with that dealer. As this provision stands, it simply means that concerns like the Standard Oil Co., the Tobacco Trust, and all other big concerns that have enough capital to enable them to establish strict agencies all over the United States, will proceed to do business in that way.

Mr. MADDEN. What the gentleman means by "strict agency" is the man who represents the concern and handles the commodity under contract?

Mr. McCOY. They go there and put in a store, and hire the agent, and have the money to do it. But the little fellow, the man you and I know in our districts, is in all kinds of business. He will not be able to compete with people in his line of business simply because he can not have these agencies. He can not carry the goods in these agencies.

Mr. GARDNER. May I see once more if I get the gentleman's idea correctly. Supposing a small manufacturer of automobiles up in Massachusetts, with limited capital, desires to sell his automobiles throughout the Union. If he desires to sell his wares through the kind of agency which this bill permits to exist, then he is obliged to supply all the capital and own all those automobiles?

Mr. McCOY. Absolutely.

Mr. GARDNER. Whereas if he can go to a smart young man in Washington, for instance, and say, "You have got a little capital; I am ready to sell you my automobiles at a low price, but I want to have somebody to hustle my automobiles on the market in preference to other automobiles." As I understand it, this bill says to that manufacturer who has not the capital to own the business himself, "You can not make any such trade in order to have your automobile boosted instead of the Packard automobile."

Mr. McCOY. Absolutely.

Mr. GARDNER. You say that the manufacturer who has a small capital ought to be able to sell his wares to some smart young man on an exclusive contract, so that he may compete with the manufacturer with large capital, provided that his agreement with the smart young man is not designed to create a monopoly in restraint of trade?

Mr. McCOY. Absolutely.

Mr. GARDNER. If I get the gentleman's idea——

Mr. McCOY. Absolutely. My amendment is in the interest of the small man, and the committee proposition is in the interest of the big man.

Mr. GARDNER. Precisely, if I understand the gentleman correctly.

Mr. McCOY. That is the exact situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. As I understand these contracts in the business world, they are for a limited period, and they do not place any hardship upon the contractee, the one who has the exclusive agency. He can terminate it under certain stipulations or at the termination of the contract, which is usually for one year or two years.

Mr. McCOY. The contract runs for a short period, and if an article is worth selling you can get hundreds of people who will seek these contracts.

Now, I want to say to the members of the committee that I would ask those who oppose my amendment to point out where in the hearings that sort of thing was complained of. And if they can not find it in the hearings then I ask proof from somewhere or other, except from mere statements that these things may happen, to justify this section without my amendment.

I yield the balance of my time.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, if section 4 of the bill is not amended along the line suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] it will restrict the opportunity of men who have never been in business before from going into any business at all. The bill purports to protect the small business man in his right to do business; but the truth is that it protects the man who needs no protection, and discriminates against the man who ought to be encouraged. A man can not go into business originally, under this provision of the bill, without taking somebody's customer away; and if he takes a man's customer away, under this section of the bill he commits a crime, because he does the man an injury. If we are not to permit men to go into business because they take the business of somebody else away from them, thereby injuring them in their business, and as a result of that commit a crime, we are not opening up competition in business; we are establishing a monopoly by this bill.

The agencies that must, as a matter of course, be permitted to be established in order to develop the growing business of the men engaged in the industrial affairs of America can not be restricted. We must have the right to establish these agencies or we can not expand. We have a convention being held in this city to-day, gathered from every quarter of America, for the purpose of devising means by which we can expand our foreign trade, and the men who are here are men who are versed in the commercial life of the world. You can not restrict the advance of commerce by any law. You can not change the trend of events by any language that you can write into any section of any bill. The development of the world can not be stopped by an attempt to limit monopoly and to extend the right of competition. It becomes apparent at once that the wise men who have tried for more than 2,000 years to regulate trade by law and to surround that trade with protection in every way, and to fix punishments for violations of the law, have not been improved upon much by the gentlemen who sit at the table of the Judiciary Committee of this House, and who have had the honor to prepare this bill. The business of the world will be done because of the activity of the men of the world——

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. In just a moment, please. To say that you can not establish an agency to put on the market the goods of the man who is starting in business for the first time, is to say that you restrict the opportunity for men to engage in business. A man with $10,000 capital, making a specialty, may have sufficient money to manufacture a small quantity of the specialty; but he has not a sufficient amount of money to expand the sale of this commodity throughout the country; and so he must, as a matter of course, engage some man who is willing to take an exclusive agency, and to that man he will sell his goods for delivery and sale within a given territory. The contract between those two men will provide that in consideration of the sale of a certain quantity of this specialty, a certain percentage will be delivered to the agent who has the contract, at a fixed price below the price at the factory. Automobile manufacturers engage agents everywhere to sell their automobiles exclusively, and they allow them 20 per cent, and out of that 20 per cent the agent pays his own expenses, his rent, his salesmen's salaries, and everything connected with the operation of the agency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. McCOY. Is it not frequently a term of these contracts that the continuance of the contract depends upon the agent selling a certain number or a certain quantity of the goods?

Mr. MADDEN. Certainly.

Mr. McCOY. So that he is pushed in the competition.

Mr. MADDEN. I was just coming to that. The terms of the contracts themselves provide that the agency will not be allowed to remain in the man who has the contract unless he produces certain results, unless he is able to pay for a certain quantity of the commodity placed on the market. And so by the establishment of these agencies, by encouraging men of small means to enter business and push their trade into every section of the Nation, you not only encourage competition but you actually create the competition; whereas if you say to a man that he can not establish an agency, you immediately prevent competition and establish a monopoly.

In connection with this legislation I have heard a good deal said to the effect that a man ought not to be allowed to select his own customer, or that he may be permitted under certain circumstances to select his own customer. Anybody would imagine, from the reading of the bill, permitting a man to select his own customers, that the people of the United States are clamoring to buy the goods of the various manufacturers of the country. The fact is there is not a manufacturer anywhere in the United States, unless it be the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co., that have not men all over the country ransacking every nook and corner in order to find customers to whom they may sell their goods.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman stated that the usual commission was 20 per cent on automobiles. Is it not a fact that the system here referred to permits an exorbitant charge to the ultimate consumer, and is not there a larger commission provided for the middleman than there is on the ordinary articles, like wagons, buggies, and so forth?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know how much commission ought to be allowed for the sale of automobiles.

Mr. STEENERSON. Is it not a fact that automobiles are unreasonably high?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know; I do not know what they cost.

Mr. STEENERSON. Do they not allow an exorbitant commission?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think it is an exorbitant commission to a man who runs an agency, who has to sell exclusive machines, who has rent and taxes to pay, who pays in advance for the machines, invests his money, has to pay for advertising, employs salesmen, bookkeepers, and all those things that enter into the conduct of a business. I maintain that there is no business in the United States conducted by anybody, unless it is a business of a fabulous amount, that can be conducted for less than 15 per cent for the average business done. If that be true, it can not be said that 20 per cent is a high commission to pay, because out of the 20 per cent he must pay 15 per cent for expenses, and if he can retain 5 per cent he is not overpaid.

Mr. STEENERSON. But the cost of production——

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know anything about the cost of production. It may be that the manufacturer can build a machine for $1,000 that he sells for $2,000.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does not this system enable the manufacturer as well as the agent to dispose of his goods for three or four times the price that it costs to produce them?

Mr. MADDEN. Any argument that we might have on the floor would not settle that question. It takes scientific information, scientific organization properly assembled, properly conducted, to run a great business, and if anybody on this floor can tell me how a great business enterprise can be conducted successfully, and tell me what it ought to cost to conduct that enterprise, I would like to get his picture. [Laughter.]

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, section 4 of this bill is intended for the benefit of the consumer. I am not going to controvert the contention that the tying or exclusive contract forbidden in this section is for the benefit of the manufacturer. I am not going to controvert that this system may be so used as to be beneficial to the retailer, but our friends who are opposed to this provision never look beyond the manufacturer or local dealer, never look to the interests and the rights of the consumers of this country. I desire to speak for the consumer, and to show you how this provision will be beneficial not only to the consumer but to every independent small manufacturer in this country.

The contention that under this system and by this kind of contract the small dealer can build up a trade is an absurdity. Here is the proposition. One of these big manufacturers carries a line of manufactured goods into your town and makes a contract to the effect that he will place the goods with a local dealer on condition that the merchant will not handle the goods, wares, or merchandise of his competitor in that line. What is the effect of it? They have commodities that are absolutely essential to the business of the merchant or small dealer, and in order that no other manufacturer may sell anything that that merchant uses to that merchant, he makes this exclusive or tying contract. If he is a manufacturer of shoes, he must be supplied with every implement, or otherwise the big manufacturer of shoe machinery would withdraw everything and cut off his supplies. The best illustration you can find of this evil practice is the leasing system of the United Shoe Machinery Co. They lease on condition that the man who takes their goods under the lease shall not deal in the commodities of any competitor.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McCOY. Do they lease on condition that he will not deal in any other goods; is it not on condition that he will not use any other goods?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, will not use, because the shoe-machinery company will not sell, but lease their machines. The manufacturers of shoes do not own the machines, and yet the gentleman from New Jersey stands for that kind of a system in this country.

Mr. McCOY. I know the gentleman wants to be fair. He knows that I do not stand for the system of the United Shoe Machinery Co., does not he?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have heard the gentleman from New Jersey repeatedly say that he did not; but he stands for a principle that has made the shoe machinery company a gigantic monopoly in this country, and if he stands for the system he stands for encouraging the building up of other like monopolies. What counts it to the American people for the gentleman to oppose the shoe machinery company if he stands for the principle that enables them to build up and enables them to maintain a great monopoly?

Mr. McCOY. Is not my amendment aimed at monopoly?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman's amendment is practically in the language of the Sherman law so far as monopoly is concerned, and yet the circuit court of appeals has held that this particular contract is not within the provisions of the Sherman law, and hence we insist that a change of the language shall be made so that it will be within the law.

What is the effect of it? The gentleman from Minnesota struck at the vital point of this whole controversy. It is the consumer. The gentleman from New Jersey seems not to understand that there is any testimony in the hearings bearing upon this question. If he will read the hearings, he will find an abundance of testimony condemning this system.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. One manufacturer of rim glasses was before our committee and he was a great advocate of this system. He made frames for $1.25, sold them to the dealer for $2, and required the dealer to sell them to the consumer for $5. The whole effect of this system and practice is to drive out competition locally and to enable the manufacturer to get higher prices. That is not the only evil of it. It discommodes the American people everywhere. Whenever a manufacturer comes along and makes one of these exclusive or tying contracts and gets the local merchant bound down to the proposition or agreement that he will handle this particular commodity, and will not handle any other commodity of like kind, manufactured or produced by a competitor, and then cuts out all other like commodities, the consumers must take that commodity or nothing, if they deal with that merchant.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN. Is not the case that the gentleman cited just now, the eyeglass case, one that involves the principle of resale, fixing the resale price, while the one that we have under consideration is one where the manufacturer has simply sold his machine or whatever it may be to the merchant or factor who represents him in the community?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. True, and these same men who were before the committee opposing this provision spent days asking the committee to bring in a provision to annul the effect of the Supreme Court decision, which denies them the right to fix the retail price.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McCOY. Do I understand the gentleman to contend that the people who were opposing section 4 were there advocating the right to fix the retail price?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not necessarily all of them.

Mr. McCOY. Were any of them?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think so.

Mr. McCOY. I disagree with the gentleman. There was not anybody there who was advocating that.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman from New Jersey insists that under this system the small man can promote his business. Let us see. The very reverse is true. The big, the powerful manufacturer makes it impossible for the small man to get in; but suppose one does get in and gets an exclusive contract of some kind, then you have two monopolies, and you never get beyond monopoly. If you had three or four, they would all result in restricted monopolies, and in the meantime the American public are denied many conveniences, and denied them by means which are tending all the time to build up monopoly and to create higher prices.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARDNER. Does not the gentleman think that the fact that all of these automobile companies have been able to build themselves up from small organizations by this very system has resulted in a benefit to the consumer?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman takes an illustration in which I am not particularly concerned—the automobile.

Mr. GARDNER. But the gentleman has been using the United Shoe Machinery Co. as an illustration.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It is the American consumer, the man who buys bread and meat and medicine, the man who labors in the sweat of his brow and who toils in season and out in order to eke out an existence that I am referring to; and to allow a system that will permit these powerful monopolies to deny them the comforts of life and extort high prices from them under exclusive contracts is what I object to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this time. I want to deal with the automobile proposition.

Mr. GARDNER. But the gentleman did not let me finish my question.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts has no right to interrupt the gentleman from Arkansas in that way.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not until I answer his question.

Mr. GARDNER. But the gentleman did not allow me to ask the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman from Massachusetts has mentioned the automobile business. I am very glad that he did. Under this system, this favored system, this system that is going to build up the small man, it is in testimony before our committee that these contracts, exclusive contracts, have enabled one automobile company, with a capital of $2,000,000, to make a profit of $25,000,000 in one year, and they or their representative gave the testimony before your committee.

Mr. GARDNER. Has the gentleman answered me?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not stand for this kind of a system.

Mr. GARDNER rose.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Oh, I am not through answering the gentleman's first question yet.

Mr. GARDNER. But the gentleman never gave me a chance to ask it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. How did they do it? How did they make it? Do you think that any business man in America with a capital of $2,000,000 can earn a profit of $25,000,000 in one year on that $2,000,000 alone? Not at all.

Mr. GARDNER. Has anybody——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a parliamentarian, and he knows that he violates the rules.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield at this time.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN], when he asks for recognition, must await it before he makes the point of order.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield at this time. I want to get through with this automobile business. I am not criticizing this automobile company, but I am describing the method they use, which I think is wrong and detrimental to the American public, one that makes automobiles higher than they should be and gives the manufacturers unusual and unjustifiable profits, not on their own investment, but upon the investment of men who deal with them, whose hands are tied and whose money is invested in property bound by an exclusive contract.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this time. I am not through with the automobile business.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline to yield until I get through answering the question of the gentleman from Massachusetts. How did they do it? They made contracts with agents throughout the country—exclusive agents—and they did not turn over their machines to these exclusive agents on their own money, but they made each agent take six machines and pay for them; and after he had taken six machines and paid the full price therefor they called him a sole selling agent and made him enter into a contract that he would not buy or handle or use the automobiles of any competitor.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this time. I am not through with the automobile business. They made these local agents, so called, buy their machines and pay for six machines, and then they gave them enormous profits to sell them to the general public, to make them active, and the result was that they sold many of these automobiles at high prices and made enormous profits, and at the end of the year this automobile company in footing up its accounts found that with an investment of $2,000,000 they had earned $25,000,000 profit in one year, speculating on other men's money, and the consumer paid the bills and paid the profits.

The dealer's hands were tied. The man who dealt with that particular dealer had to purchase that particular class of automobiles and could not buy any other.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. McCOY. Is not the net result of the Ford operations that the Ford machines are now cheaper than baby carriages used to be?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not know how high baby carriages used to be [laughter], but the price of the Ford machine, if they are making a profit of $25,000,000 a year on a $2,000,000 investment, is certainly high enough for American customers and purchasers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McCOY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask whether the gentleman proposes to try to silence discussion——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am not attempting to silence discussion.

Mr. GARDNER. I am reserving the right to object——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman means that if I do not see proper to yield to the gentleman or any other Member of the House in the midst of a discussion before I finish my argument, he can object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I want to see if we can not close debate on this question in, say, 15 minutes.

Mr. McCOY. I ask the gentleman to yield to me then.

Mr. MANN. We have wasted about one hour on one amendment, and there are other amendments to be offered, and I notice the committee has taken up a large share of the time that has been wasted.

Mr. WEBB. That was on requests from the other side.

Mr. McCOY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas have leave to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina how much time has already been taken up in this connection?

Mr. WEBB. I am sorry to say I can not answer, but I think 30 minutes has been taken up——

Mr. MANN. It has been over an hour.

Mr. WEBB. Thirty minutes have been occupied by the gentleman favoring the amendment and 10 or 15 minutes by those who are opposed to it.

Mr. MANN. It has been an hour since the amendment was offered.

Mr. BARNHART. Why not have all the amendments which are prepared read from the desk and then determine which are of the most importance and which will require the longest discussion?

Mr. TOWNER. I suggest to the gentleman that we ought to be allowed to determine that ourselves.

Mr. WEBB. Can the gentleman suggest how much time gentlemen require on that side?

Mr. TOWNER. I have three amendments I desire to offer, and I only ask for five minutes on each one.

Mr. ALLEN. I want five minutes on the amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. I want five minutes.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I would like to have 10 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Forty minutes are required on this side.

Mr. WEBB. We would like to have 30 minutes on this side, so say 70 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey withdraw his request for unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. Have it included in this and yield time. How much time does the gentleman want on that side?

Mr. WEBB. Out of abundance of caution we will take 35 minutes on this side, and the other side can have 45 minutes. I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and amendments thereto be limited to 75 minutes——

Mr. MANN. The understanding being that the amendments may be disposed of as they come along?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; that can be done. Forty minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 35 minutes by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate upon section 4 and all amendments thereto be closed in 75 minutes, 40 minutes of which time to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 35 minutes by the gentleman from North Carolina. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there certainly ought to be some proper way of conducting matters here. Parliamentarians ought not to be allowed to interrupt the gentleman speaking without addressing the Chair. It is a grave breach of the rules for a man to interrupt without first addressing the Chair and obtaining that privilege. Now, that great parliamentarian, as he claims to be, from the State of Massachusetts willfully violated the rule time after time; and this great lawyer from New Jersey, who is not courteous enough——

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. DONOVAN. I withdraw the objection, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Massachusetts ought to be glad that the gentleman from Connecticut was awake. When I went to the ball game yesterday he was asleep. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio if he is against the amendment——

Mr. ALLEN. I am for the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Then I can not yield the gentleman time.

Mr. McCOY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCOY. By the agreement which was entered into, who controls the time with reference to this amendment which I have proposed?

The CHAIRMAN. There was no agreement with reference to the particular amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. The agreement was that the time upon this section and amendments thereto should be limited to 75 minutes—35 minutes of which time to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and 40 minutes by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. McCOY. Now, another parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCOY. Is there any violation of the rules if one Member carries on a private conversation with another Member?

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, there is not unless it disturbs the business of the committee.

Mr. McCOY. It remains for the other Member to object if he is being disturbed. I just wanted to know how far one could go.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Does the Chair hold a man can take the floor at any time without addressing the Chair?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] can not do that, although he is doing it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, always violates the rules more than any other Member of this House, and no other Member uses the personal pronoun to equal him, under any circumstances. And I have no further inquiry to make.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolutions of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 152. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the International Congress on Occupational Diseases;

S. J. Res. 151. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in an International Exposition of Sea Fishery Industries;

S. J. Res. 105. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in the Sixth International Dental Congress; and

S. J. Res. 153. Joint resolution authorizing the President to accept an invitation to participate in an International Congress on Neurology, Psychiatry, and Psychology.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I have read this amendment carefully, and it seems to me that the gentleman in charge of the bill ought not to object to it, because I think it is reasonable, and should be adopted for the same reasons that impelled the committee to incorporate substantially the same language in section 2 of the bill, relating to price discrimination. While it is stated in the report that there is no objection to the establishment of exclusive agencies and no intention to prohibit same, yet, if the language is not amended as proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY], all that a concern that wanted to evade the law would have to do would be to say to its agent, "If, after instructing you in the use of our machine, advertising it, and so forth, you sell the similar goods of some other concern we will decline to renew our contract with you," and thus evade the law. Now, we do not want to write the law in that way. What we want to do is to write a law that will promote competition by enabling the small manufacturer to maintain agencies throughout the country, where otherwise he could not do so. The great corporations are able to maintain their own selling organizations. Therefore this amendment appeals to me as being in the interest of the small manufacturers.

Now, I want to have read in my time a letter from the Business Men's Club of Cincinnati, Ohio, where this matter was thoroughly discussed, and also a letter and resolutions from the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati in reference to the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE BUSINESS MEN'S CLUB CO.,
Cincinnati, May 16, 1914.

Hon. ALFRED G. ALLEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ALLEN: At the regular monthly meeting of the board of directors of the Business Men's Club held last night a resolution was passed protesting against the passage of section 4 of H. R. 15657, and directing me to convey to you the protest of the Business Men's Club's directors and to ask you to see that it receives proper attention and is presented as soon as possible to the proper committee considering the bill.

The resolution passed is as follows:

"Resolved, That the board of directors of the Business Men's Club Co., of Cincinnati, strongly protests against the passage of section 4 of House bill 15657 because—

"This section as it stands is in the interest of the large combines and monopolies. They do not need the middleman as do their smaller competitors. They can afford to establish their own selling organization in the various market centers—in fact, most of them now have their own selling organizations—and this section, prohibiting exclusive selling agreements, takes away the only means by which the smaller competitors of these big combines are enabled to compete with them in selling. The smaller concerns, as a rule, can not afford to establish their own selling organizations, and therefore must have the aid of the middleman.

"This section would prohibit smaller concerns from selecting an exclusive middleman representative under an exclusive arrangement. They would have to sell to all middlemen, which would mean indifferent and inefficient representation in competition with the bigger concern with its direct selling organization. When all middlemen may handle identical products, then no middleman takes any special interest in it.

"Under the present method of exclusive selling arrangements there is ample competition between the various middlemen for the benefit of the consumer. Each middleman is fighting every other middleman in the interest of his exclusive line. If the exclusive agency arrangement is abolished and the manufacturer must sell all middlemen, who in turn must sell all competing makes of the same article, then economy and efficiency in selling are destroyed and selling expenses greatly increased; for this would mean that the middleman must maintain larger stocks, larger warehouses, greater number of salesmen, etc. These increased expenses must ultimately be paid by the consumer.

"The 'exclusive agency agreement' method of sale is very widely employed to-day in all the various channels of business. Certain makes of shoes, hats, clothes, tobaccos, foods, manufacturing supplies, automobiles, etc., are handled exclusively by certain middlemen. A provision, therefore, which makes this arrangement a misdemeanor under the Sherman Act, if enacted in the law, would bring about a very wide disturbance of existing business methods. All of this seems unnecessary and unwise, inasmuch as the 'exclusive agency' method of sale as practiced to-day does not in any way act in restraint of trade or of full competition for the benefit of the consumer.

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to Congressmen ALFRED G. ALLEN and STANLEY BOWDLE, with the request that it be presented as soon as possible to the proper committee considering the bill."

Thanking you for the interest you may take in the matter, I am,

Respectfully, yours,

RUTHERFORD H. COX,
Civic Secretary, Business Men's Club.

CINCINNATI CHAMBER OF COMMERCE,
Cincinnati, May 20, 1914.

Hon. ALFRED G. ALLEN,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. ALLEN: Inclosed please find copy of resolution adopted by the board of directors of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce at a meeting held May 19, 1914.

If consistent, the chamber of commerce would appreciate your support of this amendment, and believes you will find, upon investigation, that this feature was included in the bill under a misapprehension of business conditions and that its adoption would tend to stifle rather than promote competition.

Very truly, yours,

W. C. CULKINS, Executive Secretary.

Whereas the Clayton bill, No. 15657, now pending in the House of Representatives, forbids the establishment of exclusive selling agreements between the manufacturer and the "middleman" and makes the same a misdemeanor under the Sherman law; and

Whereas the present method of establishing exclusive selling agreements is widespread and a common practice in business; and

Whereas it tends to promote competition by enabling the smaller producer to maintain agencies at many places where he would be unable to provide a selling organization, thereby leaving that territory under the exclusive control of the larger organizations, who maintain their own individual selling force: Therefore be it

Resolved by the board of directors of the chamber of commerce, That we are opposed to the inclusion in the Clayton bill of the provisions prohibiting such selling agreements and urge that they be stricken from the bill; and be it further

Resolved, That copies be sent to the Representatives of this county and to the Senators from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read in my time a letter, which I send to the Clerk's desk. This letter is from probably the largest shoe manufacturing company in the world and is in favor of section 4 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

ST. LOUIS, MO., May 20, 1914.

Hon. WILLIAM L. IGOE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: The Clayton bill (H. R. 15657), introduced in the House on May 2, is of deep interest to shoe manufacturers.

Particularly is this true with regard to section 4 of said bill.

In shoe manufacturing there prevails to-day more keen, active competition than exists in any other great industry, but progress and development in shoe manufacturing is being retarded by the lack of competition in shoe machinery.

The present system of leasing shoe machinery, with stipulations that the machines so leased shall exclude the use of similar machines of another make, has reached a high degree of monopoly in shoe machinery.

It appears to the shoe manufacturer that more time has been spent in developing and perfecting the various and numerous clauses in the leases by the Shoe Machinery Co. than has been given to development and improvement of machines.

Under the lease system when a factory is once equipped with machines which pay a constant and high royalty to the machinery company, there is no incentive to the machinery company to put new and improved machines into such a factory, for by so doing the profit-paying machines then in operation will be made useless by the later models.

This strong incentive to stifle improvement in shoe machinery is one of if not the greatest evil of "exclusive use" at which the Clayton bill is directed.

Respectfully, yours,

INTERNATIONAL SHOE CO.,
By F. C. RAND.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. MCCOY].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment and I favor the provision as it stands. While the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] was discussing this amendment he referred particularly to the price of automobiles, and he admitted that the result of this system was to maintain the retail price—the price to the consumer of that article—no matter how much competition there might be in the actual supply. And that is the result of the operation of this system, namely, that it destroys competition in price. You might have a billion automobiles for sale, of one hundred thousand different varieties, and yet you would have to pay five or six or ten times more for them than it costs to produce them.

Mr. MCCOY. Now, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. STEENERSON. Not now. I will yield later.

Now, take this system, and it may be said as to certain lines it is all right. Now, I will illustrate it in a matter that affects the actual living expenses. Some years ago my attention was called to the fact that on a line of railroad running out of St. Paul, Minn., we had a number of towns located in a rich farming country where they raised live stock, and one of these farmers asked me why they could not sell a fat steer or even a corn-fed steer to the local butcher, but that the local butcher had to buy his meat from a refrigerator car sent out by the Beef Trust from St. Paul. I went to the butcher shops in several of those towns and was informed that in order to get fresh beef they had to buy it from that trust. If they bought from the farmer, then they could not get these other staple articles that every butcher shop has got to keep or get out of business, for instance, lard, ham, bacon, cheese, salt fish, pickles, and various other of these side lines.

Now, if they could not buy those articles they could not keep shop, and they would not sell them to them because they did not buy their fresh meat from them. If they bought one steer from a farmer, either dressed or killed it themselves, they could not buy these other articles, and the result was, that although a laboring man in one of those towns could have bought his meat for 10 or 15 cents a pound and still give the butcher a reasonable profit, if the butcher had been able to buy from the farmers, as a matter of fact he had to pay 25 to 30 cents a pound, an enormous profit to the Beef Trust.

Now, this proposition contained in this bill is the only proposition I have seen yet coming from the Democratic Party that will actually tend to reduce the cost of living. I have criticized their tariff bill as failing to reduce the cost of living, and I stand by every word I have said, but they have, either intentionally or accidentally, in this section hit upon a way by which the ultimate consumer will in a certain degree receive the benefit and have a little chance to get a lower cost of living. [Applause.]

Mr. MCCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes; I will yield.

Mr. MCCOY. Now, I would like to have the gentleman point out how section 4 of this bill meets that particular situation which he has described up in his State.

Mr. STEENERSON. I say that the man could not be supplied with these other articles unless he bought these articles.

Mr. MCCOY. That has nothing to do with this section.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, yes; it has.

Mr. MCCOY. Not with my amendment.

Mr. STEENERSON. The practice in some of those places has been destroyed by the State law, but, for instance, there are articles such as was read from the desk, in the letter presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ALLEN], articles of food, for instance, cereal food, that cost 1 cent a pound to produce, and they sell them for 15 cents a pound, and you exclude the right to sell any other competing article.

Mr. MCCOY. There is no testimony before the committee to that effect.

Mr. STEENERSON. I know there is not, but we have got to go by our experience throughout the country. There is the article of stock food, for instance. It is a matter of common knowledge that one manufacturer of stock food in Minneapolis, who gets his screenings and his bark from the sawmill for only a fraction of a cent a pound, through this tying system excludes all other articles from his exclusive agencies and is enabled to charge an exorbitant price. Of course he spends a very large part of it for fraudulent advertising, such as is described in the report on this bill, and the result is that people pay three or four times as much for the article as it costs. There is the test. It is a system that does not tend to supply the public goods at a reasonable price or that tolerates competition in price. It does not tend to efficiency. The test of efficiency is cheapness to the consumer. Price is ordinarily governed by supply and demand, but this system nullifies that law and enables the manufacturer and middleman to exploit the consumer at will. It is a system that is indefensible from the public point of view.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. STEENERSON. There is the test of the system: Will it produce a more economical distribution of the necessities of life? Will the abolition of this system tend to give to the consumer cheaper clothing, cheaper food, and cheaper vehicles? I asked the gentleman from Illinois about the comparative profit there was in selling other vehicles, like sleighs, wagons, and buggies. Does anybody suppose that the manufacturer of bobsleighs or of lumber wagons or of buggies would expect to give his agent 20 per cent commission, or that he could sell his buggy to his agent for two or three times what it cost to produce it? No. They are articles which enter into ordinary commerce, and the tendency is to produce them as cheaply as possible and to give the benefit of that cheaper production to the man who buys them, whereas no matter if you live in a land of plenty, no matter if the automobile is a vehicle that is as plentiful as the air you breathe, under this system you would have to pay three or four or five times more than it costs to produce them.

I am opposed to this amendment and am in favor of the provision of the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the time is controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, my intention is to go with the committee on this proposition, although I think anyone who has sat here for the last hour and listened to this discussion must in honesty confess that it is completely confusing. It has been proved here that a sales agency is, under certain circumstances, a good thing, and it undoubtedly has been proved here, on the contrary, that a sales agency can be a very bad thing, and both propositions are true. A monopoly, exercising the power which comes through a sales agency, can crush the retail trade down, and has crushed it down; can prey upon the ultimate consumer, and does prey upon him. Yet at the same time the instrument of a sales agency can be used, as in the beginning of a new business, for the benefit of the retail trade and for the benefit of the consumer.

This situation, which is so plainly exemplified in the contradictions of this discussion, is a natural result of trying to write into law statutory prohibitions against business forms by adopting definitions of changing business practices. Take, for instance, the actual practical application of this section 4. We are simply turning the matter over to the courts. For after Congress shall have passed it, made it law, the Attorney General will, with timidity and hesitation, attempt to enforce it. It will finally reach the courts for interpretation, and after the lapse of 8, 10, or 12 years the business world will reach some sort of a definite understanding about the actual meaning of the section. What will happen to business in the meantime? Advantage to the powerful and monopolistic, and harm and disadvantage to smaller business.

The Democratic Party had its chance this year to create an interstate trade commission with real power to differentiate between big business which is monopoly and big business which is not monopoly, between monopoly which is harmful and big business which is not. You did not embrace that opportunity, and you are going to pay your penalty in a good many different ways. You stand before the country to-day timid and hesitating. You have against you the great predatory powers, and they are using your very hesitant course of action here in this trust program to terrorize small business. I want to read to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] a letter which I have received. By the way, I am not antagonizing the position of the gentleman from Arkansas on this particular section in so doing. A merchant in my district has received a letter from the president of the Pictorial Review, a fashion publication in the city of New York. This letter, sent to me by William Allen White, of Emporia, Kans., is as follows:

NEW YORK, May 1, 1914.

DEAR SIR: We take the privilege of writing you on a subject of vital importance to yourself and the country at large. It is no doubt evident to you that prosperity has been lost somewhere in this country, owing to the mischievous activities of the politicians, as recognized by all men.

We inclose herewith draft of a letter which embraces the views of a majority of the thinking business people of our section of the country and which should be addressed to the President of the United States, the Congress, and members of the Interstate Commerce Commission, respectively. Might we suggest, if you agree with us, that you take the trouble of writing letters of a similar character to the President, the Members of the United States Senate and the House of Representatives from your State? If you prefer to use copies of the inclosed letter we will mail you as many copies as you can conveniently use. Just send us a postal card. It will be more effective, however, if you write them on your own letterheads. The sooner this appeal is made the greater effect it will have on the politicians who have caused the loss of prosperity.

Inclosed find a list of names and addresses to whom the letter should be sent, but we omit the names of the Representatives and Senators from your State, with whom you are no doubt familiar.

Yours, respectfully,

THE PICTORIAL REVIEW CO.
W. P. ALMELT, President.

With this letter is a draft of another letter to be addressed to Members of Congress, the President of the United States, the Interstate Commerce Commissioners, the Speaker of the House, and others. This draft of a proposed letter is as follows:

HONORED SIR:

We respectfully appeal to your sense of justice and ask in the name of the suffering American people, in the name of common sense, why wantonly harass business at this juncture when it is struggling for its very existence?

Why throw more thousands of men idle when so many families are already starving?

Why subject business to any experimental legislation now, when it is not prosperous? Postpone it. Drastic action on your part is a peril at this time. What we do need is a little building up—no more tearing down. We have had a sufficiency of experimental legislation for the present.

The granting of the petition of the eastern railroads for a 5 per cent freight increase will do more for the prosperity and development of the country than all legislation against unlawful restraint and monopolies. Such a determination will result in a movement forward, not backward, and any contrary determination by the Interstate Commerce Commission will emphasize the fact that Washington hostility is balking prosperity. The merchants of this country are vitally interested. Business must not be retarded, otherwise commercial failures will increase. The continual senseless attacks by governmental bodies upon merchants, by impending assaults upon railroad, industrial and mercantile corporations, revision of the tariff, and currency reform have resulted in sinking business to such an extent that it has thrown hundreds of thousands out of employment, reduced wages, and decreased values in railroad industries and mercantile corporations to the extent of at least $3,000,000,000.

The most serious situation that confronts the country to-day is the fact that unemployment is growing more acute. We need relief. We ask the Congress of the United States to halt before it is too late. Postpone all antibusiness legislation. Give the country a rest, and last but not least permit Congress to earn a well-deserved early rest.

Yours, respectfully,

_____.

This letter from this New York concern is apparently sent to dry goods men all over the land, asking them to write to all these various officials in Washington to cease what the letter designates antibusiness legislation. It is part, apparently, of the plan of the great powers in New York City to terrorize small business and the effort is not fruitless, for that terror has reached the hearts of the Democratic leaders. You are putting through this body and expect to pass through the Senate halfway patch-work legislation that will not reach the sore spot in this country, but which will add to already deplorable business confusion. When you do that you are playing into the hands of the big interests who want no legislation at all, who want merely further confusion and delay. That is the truth of the matter. You had a chance on the Democratic side this year, and I was hoping that you would take advantage of it, to give to an interstate trade commission power to make the differentiations, which would clarify instead of befogging the business world. You did not take it. You passed the problem up to the courts, and we will wait 8 or 10 or 12 years for them to tell us what section 4 means. The country can not afford to wait. The larger interests are all the time growing larger and more powerful, and little business is growing more desperate. And all the time the monopoly pirates, fattening upon inadequate statutes or delay, are working to induce the smaller men out over the country to write to Congressmen protesting against any legislation at all. The country needs legislation, but it needs legislation that will bring quick remedies to business ills, and not put the matter over into the overcrowded courts, ill adapted for this work, while the honest business of the country is made to wait helplessly and hopelessly on through the years. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, there may be some of the 23 sections of this bill that are open to criticism along the line the gentleman has just made, that they are of doubtful meaning, for it is sometimes very hard to make words in the English language express just exactly what you mean; but I believe this section 4 is the least open to that objection of any section in the bill, and I am rather surprised that my friend from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] should make that criticism of this particular section. Stripped of some of its verbiage, that section reads as follows:

SEC. 4. That any person * * * who shall lease or make a sale of goods, * * * or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon such price, on the condition or understanding that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods * * * of a competitor * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

It means simply this, that if I am a manufacturer or a wholesaler, and go to a small town and pick out the most popular merchant in that town—I have advertised my goods well—and, of course, naturally he is anxious to buy them. I go to this most popular merchant and tell him that I will let him buy my goods, provided he will not sell or carry in stock any of my competitor's goods. Now, I do not know how other gentlemen may look at such a contract, but that contract, in my opinion, is in and of itself a contract in restraint of trade. Enough of those particular restraining contracts combined would make such manufacturer or wholesaler guilty of violating the Sherman antitrust law. One act, one contract, would not come within the meaning of the Sherman antitrust law, but a series of acts, each one of which we condemn in this section, would bring them within the terms of the Sherman antitrust law, and what we are trying to do is to forbid the various individual acts which irresistibly lead to monopoly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. This provision, as I read it, seems to affect the seller of the goods and not the purchaser. Suppose there is a merchant in town who desires to purchase a line of goods handled by another dealer, made by some manufacturing concern, under this bill he could not compel the manufacturer to sell these goods to him.

Mr. WEBB. I do not quite understand the gentleman.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I have in mind a manufacturer of a line of stock food. I am engaged in selling stock food. It is sold by my competitor, and I can not buy it because it is being handled by my competitor. Is there anything in the bill which would allow me to compel the manufacturer or producer to sell to me? As I read the bill I am prevented from buying it.

Mr. WEBB. Oh, no; not at all. You could not compel him to sell to you. He can choose his customers. All this section forbids is that when I sell goods to a purchaser and get my money for them I can not at the same time contract with him that he shall not sell anybody's goods which compete with mine.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose I am the manufacturer of a soap and I make a specialty of it. I have advertised it extensively, and I go into the town which the gentleman has referred to and try to make an arrangement with the local merchant that he will sell my soap. I have gone to great expense in advertising, but I do not say to him that I want him not to use the goods of my competitor. Am I violating the law?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Mr. MOORE. If I build up a trade and establish a reputation for my goods, I can go into the gentleman's town and make an arrangement with the local dealer to sell my goods, provided I do not say that he must not sell the goods of my competitor?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; so long as you do not bind him not to sell your competitor's goods.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose I am the inventor and the manufacturer of a phonograph and I have devised certain records that produce sound more clearly than other phonographs, and I go into the gentleman's town and offer the local dealer my business, the exclusive right to sell my particular records, and another and inferior article is offered to that dealer, am I to be punished because by reason of my inventive genius, superior knowledge, and the superiority of my article, I say to the local dealer that I will give him my exclusive trade and that he is not to put on the shelves something that will be advertised as "just as good," thus faking the public?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; you are to be punished if you make a contract with him that will prevent him from selling a competitive article. He should be left free to sell such articles as he chooses to keep in stock.

Mr. MOORE. Suppose I have a proprietary medicine, a cough cure, selling at 25 cents a bottle, and some one has something not so good, but which can be produced a little cheaper, and I make an arrangement with the dealer as against the inferior article. Can I still be punished?

Mr. WEBB. If you make a contract with the merchant that he shall not sell any competing goods but yours, you are to be punished, and you ought to be punished. Let the public find out the inferior quality of the goods, but give the merchant freedom in his business. The public is more interested in preventing monopoly than in the quality of the goods. If we can prevent monopoly, the public will soon discover the fake or inferior goods.

Mr. HELGESEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. HELGESEN. Take the illustration used by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, where a manufacturer goes into the town and offers business to the dealer, but does not say to him that he must not handle the goods of any competitor, but says, "If you will handle mine I will give you 5 or 10 per cent extra discount," would he be punishable?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; he would be; he would come within the intent and meaning of this section if such agreement is to prevent the sale of competitive goods.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNER. Does not the gentleman think that this will result in a decrease of competition rather than an increase of competition, which of course we all desire? For instance, three dealers handling phonographs may each handle them all; would not there be more competition if each handled one than if all three dealers handled all of the phonographs? Is not there likely to be a decrease of competition?

Mr. WEBB. In answer to that I will say that it is barely possible, but not probable. Business should be left to take care of itself if not built on immoral or illegal contracts. I do not believe there is a man on either side of the House who will say that it is right or fair business for a manufacturer to make a contract with the merchant to sell only his goods and that he shall not sell goods that compete with his. It ought not to be allowed.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. ALLEN. This amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey does not affect the proposition, for the gentleman has stated "it shall be done with intent to establish a monopoly or destroy the business of a competitor."

Mr. WEBB. Yes; and there you have two things necessary to be proven. The amendment which my friend from New Jersey has offered sends us back to the Sherman law. You have got to prove both the illegal contract and the intent, and so forth. In the section as written you have only to prove the illegal contract. If the manufacturer makes a monopolistic contract, he ought to be punished for it without having to prove also that he intended to hurt some one thereby. He should not be allowed to make such contract, whether he actually intends to injure or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Would not the logic of the gentleman's position be that any jobber would not be permitted to select an agent or drummer to sell exclusively his wares?

Mr. WEBB. No; there he is the agent or the drummer, and he does not buy the goods from the manufacturer, but simply represents the jobber as agent.

Mr. STAFFORD. But he might sell them on certain commissions.

Mr. WEBB. He represents the manufacturer, and is the agent.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Suppose a dealer comes into a city, goes to the manufacturer and says to him, "I will handle your goods if you will not permit anyone else in town to do it," would that be legal?

Mr. WEBB. I think it would come within the spirit of the section if the manufacturer accepted such condition, and I think it ought to.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think it ought to also; but it does not seem to me that it would. It seems to me that you cover it only in one way. Suppose the retailer says to the man, "I will handle your goods if you will not make a contract with anyone else to handle them."

Mr. WEBB. That might be done, but we are trying to unfetter the little business man and protect him and his customers from monopolistic contracts imposed by the big dealer.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If you do not stop that sort of procedure, will not the other be useless?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will they not simply change the manner of doing business?

Mr. WEBB. We want the little merchant to be able to buy all kinds of goods, keep a variety, and sell them to his customers, instead of being confined to one particular man's line.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Under the statement the gentleman has made, would it not still be a monopoly in any particular village, because they would select one particular man?

Mr. WEBB. It would be a monopolistic contract if the buyer and the seller agreed to such condition.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. ADAIR. There is nothing in this bill, as I understand it, that prevents a manufacturer from establishing an agency for his goods in any town, and giving that agent the exclusive right to sell the goods, provided he does not tie him up with a contract not to sell anybody else's goods?

Mr. WEBB. That is true.

Mr. ADAIR. I would not vote for this bill if it prevented a manufacturer from establishing an agency.

Mr. WEBB. It prevents the manufacturer from going to a little or big merchant and selling goods to him on condition that that merchant shall sell only his goods and not sell the goods of any competitor, and I ask both Republicans and Democrats on the floor of this House to give their support to that proposition, because it is good business morals, and it is a long step toward unfettering the little business man all over the country, and it will make the little country merchant feel that he can furnish supplies of all sorts and varieties to his customers instead of forcing them to go to the big mail-order houses to get what they want because they can not find the goods on the shelves of their local merchant.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, is there anything to prevent a competitor from going into a country town and making the same deal that the person sought to be affected by this bill made? Why could not a competitor go into the country town and set up his business in his own way with another dealer?

Mr. ADAIR. He does; and he should.

Mr. MOORE. Is not that his remedy?

Mr. ADAIR. That is his remedy. Will the gentleman yield for one more question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; just for one question.

Mr. ADAIR. I am engaged in the manufacturing business. We go out into the markets and establish agencies. We sell our line of goods to one man in a county, and to nobody else, but we do not bind him up in a contract to buy the goods of no one else.

Mr. WEBB. Then the gentleman is exempt from this section, and ought to be. If there are a dozen kinds of knives and razors, every merchant who buys them ought to have the right to buy all of them and sell them to anyone he pleases, and no one manufacturer ought to have the right to exclude him from the privilege of buying any razor or knife in competition with the one that he is selling him.

Mr. ADAIR. It is no part of monopoly for a manufacturer to establish an agency.

Mr. WEBB. No. Certainly not under this section. What we are striking at is the monopolistic contract.

Mr. McCOY. Does not the Standard Oil Co. have agencies all over the United States?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, I understand so.

Mr. McCOY. Is not that the biggest monopoly there is?

Mr. WEBB. Yes. But we are not aiming at monopoly per se in this section, but at a contract or contracts which lead to monopoly. Monopoly is covered by the Sherman law, and we are trying to prevent those contracts which build up and lead to such monopoly.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It being a common practice for people who invent something or who manufacture a specialty to place it in the hands of a local merchant and advertise it at the expense of the manufacturer or the seller, under this provision, if that should be done so as to build up a trade in this specialty in this store, the storekeeper would have a right to take in a competing article and get the benefit of the advertisement, as I understand it.

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That looks moral, also.

Mr. WEBB. He has that right now, and exercises it every day under a decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. ADAIR. You walk into a drug store down here in the city and ask for a bottle of Hood's sarsaparilla, and the druggist says, "Yes; I can give you that, if you want it, but here is one that is just as good," and he sells it to the customer at a cheaper price.

Mr. MANN. Not to me, not sarsaparilla. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAIR. Since when did the gentleman quit drinking sarsaparilla?

Mr. MANN. I never quit, for I never commenced.

Mr. ADAIR. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon. I believe his beverage is Peruna?

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is the gentleman's specialty, not mine. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEBB. Briefly, Mr. Chairman, this section does not prohibit any manufacturer from establishing agencies, for when he establishes agencies he furnishes the goods to the agents, and the title to the property usually remains in the manufacturer, and the agent acts for him and sells his goods and returns the money when he sells them.

It does not forbid the manufacturer to go into a town and sell to one customer alone, provided he does not add to that sale the condition that that customer shall not sell competitive articles. It does not prevent that kind of sale, provided the illegal condition is not added to it. Now, I want to say this. Unscrupulous big business and the trusts are not in favor of this section, for it destroys one of their favorite weapons. They are trying to put forth the small business fellow to oppose this section, to make it appear that the little fellows are against this provision; but, as a matter of fact, those who are destroying competition in this country are the real opponents of this section.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. McCOY. Did one of these little fellows who were crowded out come before the committee?

Mr. WEBB. Every independent, as I remember, who spoke before the committee was in favor of section 4.

Mr. McCOY. I would like to have one name.

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will give me time to look the matter up in the volumes of hearings, I could find it, and my colleagues will bear out my statement.

Mr. McCOY. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. WEBB. No; I can not. My friend had 30 minutes, and I have only 12. This illegal, monopolistic contract system is what has built up the big mail-order houses and practically destroyed the little merchants all over this country, because the little merchant is ordinarily an honest man, and when an agent of a trust walks into his little store and says, "I will sell you these articles that have been splendidly advertised if you agree never to sell any of our competitors' articles." The little merchant agrees, and he feels bound to stand by it. His customers see that they can buy but one line of articles from him and turn to the mail-order house, where a variety of articles is found, and his customer sits down and orders from the mail-order house and soon the little merchant is destroyed, because he is fettered by the trust's exclusive contract. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman tell the House what gives the mail-order house a monopoly if it is not the Government of the United States by giving it the use of the mails?

Mr. WEBB. I am not talking about the monopoly given by the United States, but I am talking about the small merchant whose business we are trying to unfetter by this bill.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman said the mail-order house had a monopoly. What gives it a monopoly if it is not the Government of the United States, which gives it the use of its mails?

Mr. WEBB. I did not say the mail-order house was a monopoly; but that the exclusive contract we forbid has driven farmers to the mail-order house. We can destroy that condition somewhat with the unfettering of the little merchant from these exclusive contracts which compel him not to sell competing goods.

Mr. MADDEN. Can we take away the right of the people to use the mails if they want to send a letter to a mail-order house?

Mr. WEBB. No; but when the small merchant is permitted to handle all the articles he pleases the mail-order house will cease to get the business, because the small man will be permitted to carry all kinds of goods on his shelves and not be confined to one single line of goods.

Mr. DONOHOE. Does this measure propose to interfere with the relation between the manufacturer and his salesman who sells on commission?

Mr. WEBB. Not at all.

Mr. GARDNER. Do the mail-order houses undersell the local merchant?

Mr. WEBB. I do not know. They sometimes do by selling an inferior quality of goods, by attractive advertising, and they gull a good many people; but they find it out sooner or later, and will go back to their honest local merchant if he carries a variety of articles from which they can select what they want.

Mr. KINDEL. Will the gentleman permit one question?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. KINDEL. Is it not a fact the parcel-post rates [laughter] have more to do with that than any other thing?

Mr. WEBB. That may have something to do with it. Now, if gentlemen of the House wish to destroy this section 4 they will vote for the amendment of my friend Mr. McCOY. If they want to retain the tooth in it, then vote that amendment down, and we will force the United Shoe Machinery Co., which is one of the completest monopolies in shoe machinery in the world, to abolish their monopolistic contracts and give the shoe manufacturers of this country a chance to live and maintain their existence by buying and using or leasing such machinery as they choose. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment again reported?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] tells us that in the interest of the consumer he is against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] tells us that in the interest of the country merchant he is against the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey because the country merchant is being put out of business by the mail-order house. Now, if the mail-order house puts out of business the country merchant, the mail-order house puts him out of business by underselling him, which many people hold to be in the interest of the consumer.

In answer to an inquiry from the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], the gentleman from North Carolina says that section 4, as it stands—and I, for one, believe in section 4, although I favor the amendment of Mr. McCOY—does not prohibit exclusive agencies. It does not prohibit exclusive agencies for the man or corporation who has capital enough; but it does prohibit the kind of exclusive agency which the man with small capital is forced to contract with. For instance, if I were an automobile manufacturer with a small capital, I could not all over the country establish agencies such as would be permitted in section 4 as it is drawn at present. I could not afford to carry the enormous stock of automobiles which would be necessary in order to break into the market. If, however, the amendment offered by Mr. McCOY is adopted, I could pursue the present practice of the automobile trade, a practice by which a small man can avail himself of the capital of other small men. That is the way the automobile business has been built up. A man who has a new make of automobiles comes to some bright young man in Washington and says, "I can not afford to make you my agent, but I will sell this machine to you if you agree to sell my machines and my machines only. If you sell other machines, I can never establish a demand for mine, because of these great automobile concerns which are already competing for the market."

This amendment is distinctly in the interest of the small manufacturer. It is the men who began as small manufacturers who have built up the automobile trade. One of them is the person who made those vast amounts of money which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has been telling us about. He did it by cutting down the cost and the price of an automobile, cutting it down and down. Apparently he can manufacture at half the cost of his competitors. Now, the gentleman from Arkansas says, "Yes; he has made such an enormous amount of money that we will build a wall around him and prevent him from having any competitor." That is what you are doing if you leave section 4 unamended. You are building a wall around these gigantically successful people, so that the next Mr. Ford who comes along will not be able to break into the business, because he will not have at his command enough capital to own automobiles all over the United States.

Neither the gentleman from Arkansas nor the gentleman from North Carolina has answered one word of what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] has said. They have told you about practices, very reprehensible ones, in restraint of trade. practices which, as a matter of fact, do produce monopolies and which are intended to produce monopolies. They have cited those practices for the purpose of defeating the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, just as if his amendment were designed to permit those practices, or would permit them. On the contrary, the gentleman's amendment forbids those practices, inasmuch as it provides that these exclusive agencies shall not be permitted if they are to be used for the purpose of building up monopolies or for the purpose of restraint of trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM].

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, there is an old story that illustrates a good deal the present situation. It tells of a man passing along the street and noticing another man working with a crowbar at the side of a cellar wall that projected above the sidewalk. He said, "My friend, what are you trying to do?" "Well," he says, "that cellar is very dark, and I am trying to let some light into it." The first man went about his business for a couple of hours, and coming back he saw the other man still working and the aperture not very much larger than when he first saw it. He said to him, "Well, my friend, how have you succeeded?" The man replied, "I haven't let much light into it, but I have let a power of dark out." [Laughter.]

And it seems to me that in much of the discussion we are indulging in here we are letting a power of dark out about this question. But, all boiled down, it is a simple proposition, as I view it. Now, I may be letting more dark out.

There are two classes of transactions aimed at in this section 4. One is a lease and the other is a sale. It is quite true that there is nothing in this section which forbids the creation of agencies. That is to say, the manufacturer may have an agent who exclusively sells his goods, because employing an agent does not involve either a lease or a sale. Indeed, the manufacturer might go to a retail dealer in some village or city or town and say, "I wish to introduce my goods here; I want to have you as my special agent, and I want you not to handle the goods of any competitor of mine"; and so long as there is not a transaction in the nature of a lease or a purchase there, then that retailer can transact that business and do it lawfully, and there is no prohibition in section 4 against such a piece of conduct as that.

Now, so far as selling is concerned, a system or practice has grown up in the business world where a man has a limited capital, or where for the protection of the manufacturer contracts are made in the nature of an agency contract, but the goods are invoiced to the man that has to do the handling of the goods, and the price is paid to the manufacturer and the transaction amounts, perhaps, to a sale. That is the kind of thing that this section 4 does forbid. I know of nothing immoral in such a transaction as that. A man can not serve two masters. He must be loyal to one or the other when their interests conflict. Wherefore, if you make such an arrangement as that, and to conserve your capital or for your own protection make a conditional sale of the goods and engage this man to handle those goods exclusively for you, there is no element of immorality involved in such a transaction. And yet that is forbidden.

The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey would cure the evil that is in this proposition created by the language of this section. You would leave business free to make any transaction that it pleases so long as it does not amount to what this amendment would cover, namely, a restriction of trade or the creation of a monopoly.

Now, let me ask in relation to the leasing question, whether it would not also cure that. In the minority report we have said:

> Again, the manufacturer sells no machines at all, but only leases them, and because they are delicate and any injury to them is his own loss, he leases them only to lessees who agree not to use imperfectly adapted parts, supplies, or appliances of other manufacture. Or he leases them at a special rental, upon the understanding that the lessees shall not use imperfectly adapted parts, supplies, or appliances of any other manufacture. Or he agrees to sell to the lessee perfectly adapted parts, supplies, or appliances, upon the understanding that the lessee shall not use imperfectly adapted ones of other manufacture. Each of these transactions—which good morals and honorable business conduct from time immemorial have always sanctioned—is forbidden by the bill.

The amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY] would cure that evil, because unless these practices amount to a restriction of trade or creation of a monopoly, they ought not to be forbidden, and would not be forbidden. Therefore I favor the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, among the gentlemen who were to have time a while ago was the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], who at that time yielded to some one else. Can the gentleman consent to let him have five minutes?

Mr. WEBB. Under unanimous consent; yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa have five minutes in addition to the time already allotted.

Mr. WEBB. May I incorporate in that a request for five minutes for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL]?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina and the gentleman from Illinois ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MITCHELL] be allowed five minutes apiece, in addition to the time already agreed upon. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this section of the bill is like the rest of this proposed statute. It lays burdens upon the small manufacturer and the small dealer, but leaves the whole matter wide open for the large concern. It is perfectly easy for any large institution to evade the provisions of this section. All they have to do in the world to except themselves from its provisions is simply to establish a selling agency of their own, to have their own agent, to hire him in accordance with any terms that they see fit, and exempt themselves entirely from the provisions of this bill. On the other hand, burdens are laid upon the small manufacturer and dealer, as has been shown here.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY], instead of taking away anything from the section actually adds to it by depriving the large manufacturer of the power to set up a monopoly through his selling agency in defiance or disregard of this section. It brings us back, really, to the Sherman law, it is true, but what harm is there in any of these trade agreements unless there is a monopoly or a restraint of trade or a hindrance of competition in some way? Who has been injured thereby? What evil is there that needs to be remedied, except something of that nature? Why should we undertake to hamper trade when that which is sought to be restricted or stopped is injuring no one and doing no damage to the business world?

The gentleman from Arkansas has said that this section was based upon a decision of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals rendered by Judge Sanborn; but that case, in my judgment, is no authority for the position which the gentleman from Arkansas has taken. The suit was one for damages under the Sherman law.

It is true that Judge Sanborn did state in that case that contracts of sale which provided that the lessee or purchaser of the article sold should not use or deal in goods furnished by other parties was not an act inhibited by the Sherman law, for the reason that he considered it was not an act done in hindrance or suppression of competition or in creation of a monopoly. But this has nothing to do with the point upon which the case actually turned and upon which the decision was based. That point was that the plaintiff was not harmed in the least by the transaction which he complained of.

The Department of Justice has never taken the position that contracts of this character, made for the purpose of promoting a monopoly or for the purpose of hindering or restraining trade, was legal, but, on the contrary, has commenced several cases and prosecuted many individuals because of their entering upon just such transactions as this. No Attorney General that I know of under any administration has ever taken the position which is now taken by the majority of the committee as a reason for bringing forward this section. The real fact is that it adds nothing in proper form to the provisions of the Sherman law, but, as I have said, simply gives additional advantages to the large concerns and throws additional restrictions upon the small dealer. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there should be any mistake among the Members of the House with reference to the extreme importance of this section of this bill. There are some important provisions in this bill, but I do not believe that there is a more vital or more important provision in it than section 4. One of the evils that this section seeks to cure is the evil with reference to the "tying contracts," and I want to call attention to one specific condition which exists in this country which has been created by this system of tying contracts. A gentleman appeared before the Judiciary Committee, an independent shoe-machinery manufacturer, who stated that from 95 to 98 per cent of all of the machinery used in the manufacture of shoes in this country was manufactured by one company. He said that they absolutely controlled and dominated the field by this system of tying contracts. They have in the manufacture of shoes some of the best machines, essential machines, machines that it is absolutely necessary for every manufacturer to have in order to do business. Manufacturers who furnish some of the minor machines and who are in the field trying to get a foothold and a market for their machines can not commercialize their business, can not get the machines into these factories because this gigantic monopoly—and there is no monopoly more powerful—has this system of tying contracts with the manufacturers. The manufacturers, in order to get the essential machines, must sign a contract that they will also take these other minor machines where there is some competition. If they do not do that, then, according to the provisions of their contract, the shoe-machinery company is able to remove all the machinery from the factory. As a result of that system, they have practically the field to themselves.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the States of this Union have recognized that evil. In Massachusetts this corporation was organized by the consolidation of a number of independent machine companies in about 1899. The manufacturers began to protest in a feeble kind of way against the continuation of this trust. The shoe journals protested against its organization and its system of doing business. The protest became so strong that in 1907 the Massachusetts Legislature passed a law seeking to remedy this evil and to open the door to the inventive genius of the thousands of men who are engaged in the shoe-machine business and who want to put shoe machines on the market. The legislature passed a law in 1907, but the effect of it has been circumvented. We have had investigations, and the Attorney General is proceeding against the shoe machinery company, believing that it is in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. I do not believe that this Congress ought to speak in any uncertain terms. I think the Members on both sides of the House ought to give this provision of the bill their support. I am not quite as familiar as are some other Members with the exclusive contracts, but I know that they form one of the greatest instruments, one of the greatest means of creating a monopoly in this country, and we have an opportunity in this bill to stop that system and break it up where it is at the present time.

What is the inducement that is offered the small dealer or the small grocery man or small business man or the dealer in any community to take one of these exclusive agencies?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Was I not correct in saying that these acts were in violation of the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. WEBB. I will answer that. The Department of Justice has held that one individual act is not, but that a series of acts will bring him within the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. MITCHELL. We want to make sure of our ground in this act. We want to give everyone a fair field and no favors. We want to give opportunity to the little fellow. We want the shoe workers, shoe manufacturers, machine manufacturers, and the great body of consumers to be freed from the grip and fetters of monopoly and special privilege. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McCOY].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McCOY) there were 28 ayes and 71 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, section 4, page 22, by inserting, in line 4, after the word "of," the words "or appoint an agent to sell," so that the section will read:

"SEC. 4. It shall be unlawful for any person engaged in commerce to lease or make a sale of, or appoint an agent to sell, goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodity on condition or with any understanding, agreement, or contract that the lessee or purchaser thereof shall not use or deal in the goods, wares, merchandise, machinery, supplies, or other commodities of a competitor or competitors of the lessor or seller; and any person violating the provision of this section shall be decreed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be fined not to exceed $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both.

Mr. WEBB. The effect of that amendment would be that nobody could sell his goods except he sold them in person; he could not establish an agency; he could not send out men to sell goods for him.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN].

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen will observe that in discussing the amendments to this section that the section applies only to the leasing and sale of goods. I voted against the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey because I think there is some real merit in this section as it now stands. But, gentlemen, if we really desire to destroy monopoly, if we really desire to protect the people against monopoly, then we ought to broaden this section so that one who sells through agencies can not prohibit the agent from dealing in the goods of a competitor, because a corporation through agents can establish and maintain a monopoly with the same degree of success that it can by the selling or leasing of goods with the understanding that the purchaser will not deal in the goods of a competitor. Now, a large number of my constituents are farmers. They deal largely with the International Harvester Co., an institution or a corporation with $120,000,000 capital.

Unless you accept my amendment, this gigantic corporation not only has a monopoly in the sale, largely, of farm machinery through agents in Oklahoma, but throughout this great Nation—to all of the 6,500,000 farmers. Are you going to leave section 4 so that it will not protect the farmers of this country against this monopoly? It seems that you are. I am in favor of reducing the power of the shoe machinery company to maintain a monopoly by leasing machines, but I am also in favor of extending the section so that it will reach the International Harvester Co., that sells the farmers of this country perhaps two-thirds, if not three-fourths, of all of their harvesting machinery. Yet, again, the majority in this House is going back on the farmers of this Nation. You are still leaving in the hands of that gigantic corporation the power to establish exclusive agencies, with an agreement or contract that they shall not act as the agents of any other firm. How is an independent manufacturer to get his goods on sale throughout the Nation? He is handicapped by the fact that the great harvester company has monopolized the active, able agents throughout this great Nation. In the report of the Corporations Commissioner upon the methods used by the International Harvester Co. he cites that that is one of the methods they use to establish and maintain their monopoly. It has been said here frequently in this debate that the section as it stands, in a measure, controls the small concern that must sell its goods direct because it has not got the power to establish agencies, but the mammoth concern may establish local and exclusive agencies, and this law will not touch it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read. I will state that the amendments which I shall offer are merely to perfect the text, and I will ask careful attention of the committee to the amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 3, strike out the words "engaged in commerce," and in line 4, after the word "sale," insert the words "in commerce."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, that amendment, I will say, is more important, perhaps, than will appear at first blush. By the language used in the text you limit the prosecution of any person to persons who are engaged in commerce, which, under the definition of commerce, means those who are engaged in interstate commerce. That is not what you mean, certainly, because you do not mean that it shall be required to prove that any person who violates this act shall be engaged in interstate commerce. The language of all of these bills is that any person who violates or does the thing which the law prohibits shall be punished. The language, for instance, of the Federal anti-trust law is that "every person who shall make any such contract or engage," and so forth. In section 2 of this bill the language is "every person who shall monopolize," and so forth. In section 3 the language is "every person who shall make any illegal contract," and so forth.

This is the difficulty with the language used. It is not as descriptive of the person that the phrase "in commerce" should be applied, but it is as descriptive of the act, and therefore the words "in commerce" should follow the word "sale" in section 4, so that it will read:

That any person—

No matter whom he may be, engaged in commerce or not—

That any person who shall lease or make a sale in commerce of goods, wares, merchandise—

And so forth.

Otherwise this section would be inoperative and perhaps unconstitutional, because it would apply in the form in which it is to sales made in intrastate commerce, which would be absolutely unconstitutional, as the gentleman knows, for Congress has not that power, so that the limitation placed here being upon the person is a limitation that ought not to exist, and the lack of that limitation on the sales would make it apply to all sales, even in intrastate commerce, and, therefore, for both reasons, the section ought to be amended, as I have suggested.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time on that amendment and offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes and offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 9, after the word "states," strike out the word "or" and insert in lieu thereof the words "and shall."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it would appear that that amendment ought to be adopted without any question whatever. The other amendment ought to have been adopted, but it is a habit that it is the requirement of gentlemen on the other side to vote down all amendments no matter whether the amendment affects the text and makes the bill stronger or not. The word "or" has no business here. It means nothing. What the gentleman means is:

Or any Territory thereof or the District of Columbia or any insular possession or other place under the jurisdiction of the United States, and shall fix a price charged therefor—

And so forth.

The word "or" certainly must have been unintentionally or carelessly used, or else it was used for the purpose of making the provision of the statute inoperative and of no effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back two minutes.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a third amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 10, after the word "condition," insert a comma and the word "agreement."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, it would seem also to the ordinary man——

Mr. WEBB. Does this amendment come after the word "understanding"?

Mr. TOWNER. No; after the word "condition." Of course it is better there——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is good; and, as far as the committee are concerned, we will accept it. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state there is no amendment pending.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. A little while ago I asked the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] as to the effect of this section upon those who undertake after advertising to place their wares by a special arrangement with a local dealer, and his answer was that unless the merchant or manufacturer who made the deal with the local dealer insisted that the exclusive right to sell should be granted apart from the question of competition that he would not be punished, but that if he in any way insisted that the competitor's goods should be eliminated, then he would be subject to the fine and imprisonment imposed by the section. And all this new and drastic legislation in the interest of the local dealer or the country merchant.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have been looking at this matter from the viewpoint of the man who is struggling to build up a business in this local way. Say there are two merchants in the gentleman's town, each striving for business, and the manufacturer of a certain brand of soap or soup, it makes no difference, comes along and says to one of them, the one who is more energetic than the other, perhaps, that he may have the exclusive right to sell the product, a specialty that he has advertised well, and that is so popular that even "the children cry for it," as some advertisements read. The goods are salable, and have been made so by the genius of the inventor or manufacturer and because of the heavy promotion expenditure made upon them.

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not in five minutes, although I would like to do so. Now, after all this labor and energy and expense of advertising it appears that if the manufacturer or jobber undertakes to say to the local merchant, "I will give you the exclusive privilege and authority of selling my popular soup or soap," he has to go to jail. That is not a very great inducement either to the manufacturer, the inventor, or the local business man. It does not aid the local business and, so far as the question of morals is concerned, it seems to punish the industrious and progressive business man in favor of the faker or the manufacturer of spurious or inferior articles, who may thus derive advantage from the legitimate advertising and the scientific energy of those who created the business and paid dearly to advance it. In other words, Dr. Cook reaps the gate receipts while the real explorer, the real patentee, the real inventor, the real manufacturer, who did the work and filled the house, would suffer the penalty of fine and imprisonment. If this be the effect of the enactment, the man who has not expended any energy, time, or money in promoting or advancing trade could always play a waiting game and then come in and take advantage of all the facilities of the trade established by the man who had the enterprise and courage to spend his money to acquire it. This does not seem fair or moral.

And there is another side to it. I make the statement now, and I challenge anybody to contradict it, that the Government of the United States itself—that is to say, the present administration of the Government—is now encouraging the very kind of business that the gentleman from North Carolina assumes by this measure to stop.

It is advertising for supplies to be used in the Mexican emergency, particularly in the Navy Department, many of which are specified, so that the manufacturer only who has made his goods popular can sell them to the Government. It is so in the case of soup, it is so in the case of soap, it is so in the case of tobacco, and a good many other articles. Specifications issued by this very administration, which is advancing and insisting upon this so-called antitrust legislation, call for supplies for our Mexican necessities which even specify certain brands of tobacco made by the Tobacco Trust; certain brands of soup, made exclusively by certain manufacturers; certain brands of soap, made exclusively by certain manufacturers of soap. This is what a trust-busting administration demands for itself.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I shall therefore avail myself of leave to extend, so that I may place in the RECORD several communications which relate to this bill. I believe they should have consideration, because they represent the sober judgment of some of the leading citizens of Philadelphia—citizens who have been deeply concerned over the recent trend of legislation and who know what they are talking about.

I submit letters from representatives of two of the oldest of our banks, presenting the views of experienced and conservative men with respect to section 9 (interlocking directors), and a memorial from the Philadelphia Board of Trade in general opposition to the bill:

THE CENTRAL NATIONAL BANK,
Philadelphia, March 25, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: An act has been introduced into the House with the intent of prohibiting interlocking directorates between certain corporations. This act has been drafted to correct certain abuses which it is alleged have crept into banking and the extension of credit on the part of certain groups of banks, presumably in New York.

In seeking to correct that which is claimed as an evil existing in the metropolis of the country far greater harm in the sum total will be done to the mass of our banking institutions and to the community at large by the enactment of this new law.

We can not recall a single instance here, in Philadelphia in which the interlocking directorate feature has prevented competition or militated unjustifiably in any way against a single individual in the commercial community. In the history of this bank, through its long and honorable record of a half century, we do not know of an instance in which the members of its board of directors have been influenced in the extension of credit in any manner which has unduly favored or has disfavored any portion of the commercial community entitled to credit from this bank.

The bill as lined up will affect probably 10 of our directors, and in the end we may lose half of them—possibly more—men whose influence stands paramount, whose integrity has always stood for the best in this community, and whose influence will not unlikely go to some State trust company here, and thus this bank will thereby be materially weakened in the personnel of its management. These men will be hard to replace, owing to their trained minds, their discriminating and analytical judgment. We cite our own bank as a concrete case; the same conditions obtain among many others here in this city, as well as among a majority of the national banks in the larger towns and cities throughout the country.

It seems to us that Congress should very carefully balance this problem, and in trying to remedy one evil not create a condition which will be even more harmful. You are seeking to build up a great banking system for us, yet this act, if it shall become a law, will weaken many of the integral parts (its leading member banks) and strengthen the State banking systems as against the regional system. Can you afford to do this, particularly when we are trying to help you in every way possible? Do you think it the part of wisdom to force large groups of the most desirable and influential men in cities like Philadelphia out of the national system into State bank or trust company directorates, and thus build up the State system at the expense of the regional system? Is it fair to harass and unjustly punish the clean, straight bankers of this country, who are in the great majority, and who have through all these years transacted a strictly uplifting, legitimate business, in order to correct an alleged abuse in one particular city?

We respectfully submit the foregoing for your consideration, and we feel it our duty in the interest of our stockholders and in the interest of the new regional system which you are seeking to build up to enter our protest against the enactment of a law which we believe will prove not only harmful to the member banks of the regional system, but will weaken the system as a whole.

Very truly, yours,

WM. T. ELLIOTT, President.

THE GIRARD NATIONAL BANK,
Philadelphia, May 18, 1914.

Hon. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: You have requested me to write you concerning the interlocking directorate feature of the trust bill now before Congress for consideration.

There is no real demand on the part of intelligent people for the enactment of any such legislation as is contemplated in the bill as it affects the directorships in national banks. Such unwise legislation will be of disastrous consequence to the banks really affected by its provisions, and as the bill is now constituted it grossly discriminates against national banks that are unfortunate enough to be operating in cities of over 100,000 population.

Interlocking directors of national banks in cities or towns of under 100,000 population could be of much more detriment to their respective communities than similar directors in larger cities, as the number and scope of the banks in smaller cities are much more concentrated, and as a consequence the possibility of a director's power greater than in the larger cities where there are a number of strong competing institutions. If so-called interlocking directors are permissible in and helpful to smaller communities, there is no line of logical reasoning that will show they are not of increasing usefulness to the cities of over 100,000 population.

We national banks in the larger cities are now to operate under the Federal reserve act, which will of necessity make a great change in the conduct of our business; in the reserve cities the banks are facing a large shrinkage of deposits on account of the reserve of other banks being transferred to the Federal reserve banks, and it is the banks in the reserve cities that will be vitally affected by the provisions of the new trust bill, and yet before we have had any opportunity to adjust ourselves to the changed conditions along comes more legislation that will deprive our banks of the services of the directors that are really the backbone of our institutions, not only on account of the value of their wide experience and the business they have been able to bring to us, but the feeling of confidence in the institution that is engendered by their association with us. What will be the effect?

The State banks and trust companies that are already getting a lion's share of the really desirable business will corral all the men of affairs and their business and their influence to the great detriment of the national banks, and the national banks will be greatly weakened by their loss, with no possible benefit to the very people the proposed legislation is supposed to benefit.

A bank can not prosper unless it gives its customers as good, if not better, treatment than its immediate competitors, and the bank with the strongest board, comprised of men of affairs interested in numerous enterprises, is usually the most alert, most aggressive, and accommodating and most useful to any community. It is against such a bank with a board that is of real benefit to its customers that this bill will discriminate; and to what good end?

Another thing that must not be overlooked—these very men that are being legislated out of directorships have in the majority of cases been invited to become associated with our financial institutions with which they are identified and have not bought their way in to control its affairs, as is so generally misrepresented, and have been, as a rule, the big factor in the success of the institution under consideration.

Take the banks in Philadelphia, for example—the important trust companies are large holders of the stocks of all the older national banks through the administration of trusts, not as actual owners, and are large depositors with our national banks. What exception can be taken to the fact that the officers of these trust companies are directors in our national banks? It is of importance to the trust companies that they are so represented, important to the trusts they represent, and of great value to the customers of the bank with which they may be identified, and of no possible harm to any interests.

Some of the most useful and conscientious national-bank directors are members of private banking firms. Why should they be eliminated by law from a directorship in a city bank? I can assure you they are of more use to any bank than the bank is to them.

You can go all along the line and take the men interested in million-dollar companies engaged in commerce and eliminate them from the directorships in national banks as provided in the act and you will take away the very men that are of the most importance, directly and indirectly, to the customers, large and small, of our national banks, and I ask who is to be benefited by their forced withdrawal? Absolutely no one, and a great business—that of national banking—disarranged and damaged.

In other words, don't drive out of national banking the very class of men that collectively are of inestimable value to the national banks, and through them to the multitude of bank customers and shareholders, and force these men into a position where they will naturally gravitate toward State banks and trust companies—with them will go their business and their influence. Instead of strengthening the national banking system you will impair its usefulness. The national banks have difficulty enough now holding their own with what are known as State banks and trust companies; the recent enormous increases in the latters' number and resources prove this.

The national banks have welcomed constructive legislation; destructive legislation along the lines contemplated is unwarranted and will be only a detriment to the country's development.

Yours, very truly,

J. WAYNE, Jr.,
Vice President and Cashier.

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Philadelphia.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Philadelphia Board of Trade, respectfully represents:

That there has been introduced into the House of Representatives a bill (H. R. 15657) entitled "A bill to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints, monopolies, and for other purposes."

Your memorialist submits the following reasons for its opposition to this proposed measure:

PRICE DISCRIMINATION.

In section 2 of the act it is declared to be a crime to discriminate in price between purchasers of commodities with the purpose or intent to injure the business of a competitor.

With the general moral purpose ascertainable in this provision no one would disagree. There is such a thing as an effort to wantonly destroy the business of a competitor by means other than those recognized as fair competition. The act, however, as drawn is, we believe, unsound and likely to do substantial harm.

Discriminations in price are essential to any freedom in trade. The manufacturer or dealer in goods who has a large supply in the West with a small demand must be at liberty to sell in the West at a lower price than he would in the East, if he had there a small supply and an active demand. He must sell at an advancing or declining scale of prices and on such market as may exist in different localities. Discrimination in price per se is a part of the life of trade, and contains no element of immorality.

Moreover, discrimination in price is an essential to competition. Competition means obtaining business formerly done by others, and this is accomplished by price cutting in the market where the competitor is operating. It would be mere hypocrisy to pretend that competition does not injure or destroy the business of the competitor. The avowed purpose of the competition is to take the competitor's business from him, as he is attempting to take your business from you. Competition is the settled policy of the law, and it would be manifest folly to pass an act requiring that the effects of competition must not exist. The direct effect of competition is "to injure or destroy."

It follows therefore that every person in a competitive business who cuts prices in order to obtain the business formerly held by some other competitor would come within the terms of the proposed act, since the direct effect of his price cutting is to injure the business of his opponent, and he is presumed to know the effect of his acts. The act as drawn should not therefore be passed. It would place everyone doing business in the United States in jeopardy of fine and imprisonment.

If we assume that there is such a thing as a willful and malicious attempt to injure or destroy the business of a competitor outside the scope of legitimate competition, legislation should be directed against such willful and malicious attempt, whether accomplished by price cutting, the spreading of false reports, or any other dishonest means or practices. What is a willful and malicious attempt should be left to the courts. The act ought not to be open to the construction that cutting prices in order to take away the competitor's business is a crime.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the Sherman Act to mean that where ruthless and destructive methods are employed with the "primary" intent to injure or destroy the business of a competitor, such acts bring the offender within the purview of the present law. Under these circumstances we do not believe that additional legislation is needed.

THE RIGHT TO SELL.

Your memorialist respectfully submits that no public necessity justifies the denial to the owners of mines or mining properties the right to sell or to withhold from sale the products of mines developed at their own risk and with their own capital. There can be no freedom unless the inherent rights of the individual are interfered with only when overpowering public necessity demands.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES.

Your memorialist believes that it will be conceded by all that the achievements and prosperity of a nation are dependent upon the productivity of the individual. Unless the man of brains, resource, and energy has scope for the use of these gifts and qualities the whole country is the loser, at home and abroad. The provision against interlocking directorates prohibits the individual with the capacity which is most needed from doing his best service for the country. For such a restriction upon individual liberty and such a handicap placed upon the energy of the Nation it should be shown that there exists a great public necessity, to be met by this means and no other. Your memorialist believes that neither prerequisite for this enactment exists.

The reasons which have been advanced for an interference by Government with existing conditions are three in number:

1. That interlocking directorates, so called, may be used to create a combination in restraint of trade. Granting this possibility, there is nothing in it to justify curtailing the usefulness of the best abilities of the country. If several directors of one corporation are acting on the board of a competing corporation in such a way as to effect a combination in restraint of trade, the arrangement can be set aside by the courts under existing law. It is not the presence of the same individual on two boards of directors that is the evil; why, then, cut down our national effectiveness?

2. That they (interlocking directorates) may sometimes be made use of to effect dishonest schemes for individual profit. Here, again, it is entirely feasible to legislate against making secret or dishonest profits from official position without depriving the business of the country of its most efficient servants.

3. That sometimes a person of large means or abilities is elected to a number of directorates and thus may become too powerful in the world of business or finance.

This ground is untenable. No country can prosper unless the incentives for individual effort are great, unless the prizes for usefulness and success are position and power. To be afraid that position and power may be misused, to take away the incentive for a nation's efforts, because some one will perhaps abuse them, is cowardice and folly.

We respectfully submit, therefore, first, that there is no overpowering public necessity for the proposed act, and, second, that other means are available for meeting any wrongs in existing conditions without emasculating the energy of the people or curtailing the productivity of the genius of the country. Legislate against fraud, conspiracies to do unlawful acts, or abuse of official positions; do not legislate against the proper liberty of the individual.

STOCK OWNERSHIP.

The provisions of the proposed act relating to stock ownership are, in the opinion of your memorialist, unnecessary and unwise. It is hard to believe that anyone familiar with business conditions can honestly assert that competition without limit is for the best good of the people; the destructiveness of competition is too evident. The degree of competition which will work the best result for all can not be determined by legislation—it must be worked out by the slow process of evolution. The great period of consolidation through which the country has passed was due partly to the realization that unrestrained competition was wasteful and uneconomic; partly because the world trade has grown to a point where the countries which would lead must operate through larger and more powerful units of business. The result has been on the whole good. No one familiar with conditions at the beginning of the period of consolidation and expansion would return to them. The law as it stands prohibits consolidations which unduly restrain trade or create monopoly. Assuming that this restriction is necessary, upon what might perhaps otherwise develop into too great a degree of consolidation, it is evident that the growth of the units of business must go on, and if two or more weaker units find it of advantage to unite it would be bad policy to prevent the working out of their salvation in their own way. We have legislated fully against the danger of monopoly, we should not be afraid of the natural working out of economic laws lest we kill our own advancement.

PICKETING.

Your memorialist most earnestly objects to the provision of the bill relating to "picketing." This practice means in plain terms the surrounding of a place of employment by those who desire to stop work in such a way that those who desire to work may be prevented by persuasion if possible, or by force if necessary, from working. The individual who desires to work ought in a free country to be protected in that right. The owner of the factory who desires to run his factory ought to be protected from willful interference. For the Government to give its official sanction to a practice which would not have to be legalized, if it were not immoral and used for purposes of intimidation, would be altogether abhorrent to fair play and stable government.

CONCLUSION.

Your memorialist believes that the consensus of opinion of the business men of this country is against the passage of this or any other so-called antitrust bill, and that to pass such an act as is now proposed would do violence to the judgment of that portion of the community perhaps best able to judge of its effect upon the welfare of the country.

The fact that the act in question is described as an antitrust bill, when in reality it deals with the law of business relations generally, is persuasive proof that the time is not ripe for the passage of additional legislation of this character. It is evidence that the framers of the bill are thinking in terms of an attack upon some more or less mythical embodiment of evil called a trust. It is certain that the country must suffer, unless the laws affecting business are framed with a scientific accuracy to prohibit only the thing that is wrong, without interfering with the convenient machinery of business or limiting the initiative and effective energy of the people.

For which reasons, among others, we respectfully submit that this bill should not receive your favorable consideration.

And your memorialist will ever pray.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART].

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I am wholly unable to understand why the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] would seem to favor the first man that comes to town with a thoroughly advertised article and would claim the right to the exclusive market because he was the first one that came along. He grants no rights whatever to a man that might come the next day and who might have an article that he had patented, that he had thoroughly advertised, and that finally might become such a well-accepted article by the American public that even the United States Government would make choice of it for supplies for the Navy or Army. Why do you have a choice? Who is entitled to the American market? The man who simply has advertised? The man who appears first? Do you grant no right whatever to the man who comes in second or third or fourth? Suppose your favorite arrived after the merchants had been tied up with exclusive selling contracts? Would you be satisfied? Now, the first man that you seem to favor would never have gotten a start in the world, he never would have had an article thoroughly advertised and acceptable to the public if exclusive agencies were in complete operation when he began to put it on the market, because under your theory when he would come to town the merchants would all have been tied up by exclusive contracts, and perhaps the very one who is now your favorite would not have any chance at all. The idea is not only to liberate the man who has the right to purchase and sell anything and every lawful thing that he pleases to sell anywhere, but to liberate the second man or the third man or the fourth man who comes to visit the merchant, and who offers his wares to the merchants of the town and places them on the market. Give them all the same even chance. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], the chairman of the committee, if it would detract anything from his bill, page 22, lines 9 and 10, if we strike out the words "or fix a price charged therefor, or discount from, or rebate upon, such price"?

Mr. WEBB. Well, I will say to the gentleman I think it would. It would hurt the effect of the bill considerably and might license the doing of those very things to which we object.

Mr. GARDNER. But you have only specified three of the devices which are customary in the case of exclusive-sale contracts. Are you not afraid that a court might hold that you intended to permit the devices which you left out?

Mr. WEBB. To what devices does the gentleman refer?

Mr. GARDNER. Now, I call your attention to your report, in which you use the expression, "the first inducement in every case must of necessity relate to price." Take the case of the United Shoe Machinery Co., which is situated in my district. The United Shoe Machinery Co. obviously might make a contract under which they would say to the shoe manufacturers, "If you will use our machines exclusively, then we will keep all your machines in order." Now, as a matter of fact, one of the reasons why the United Shoe Machinery Co. has so many supporters among the small manufacturers in my district is because of the fact that they keep all their machinery in order. I have not any sympathy with their system of "tying" leases at all, but their system for promptly repairing machinery is remarkable.

Mr. WEBB. I think the words "discount from" or "rebate upon" would cover what the gentleman desires.

Mr. GARDNER. I doubt it.

Mr. WEBB. If there is any doubt, and the gentleman will offer an amendment to cure it, the committee will accept it.

Mr. GARDNER. I should prefer to have the gentleman from North Carolina do that. It is a rather embarrassing thing for me to do, seeing that the United Shoe Machinery Co. is situated in my district. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PHELAN] can give the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] full information as to the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, in line 22, after the word "found" strike out the comma and insert the words "doing business and the cause of action may accrue."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have prepared this amendment to be inserted after the word "found" in section 6—the words "doing business and the cause of action may accrue;" and I have also prepared an amendment to be inserted in section 10 after the word "found," using the same language.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. DICKINSON. As I have only five minutes, I prefer to proceed for a few minutes, and then when I have made my statement I will ask for additional time, for the purpose of responding to any questions, if consent is given.

On last Saturday, during the general debate, I made some suggestions with reference to adding some language after the word "found" in section 10, which reads as follows:

SEC. 10. That any suit, action, or proceeding under the antitrust laws against a corporation may be brought not only in the judicial district whereof it is an inhabitant, but also in any district wherein it may be found.

Upon considering the bill, it seemed to me that the same amendment ought to be offered on page 22, in section 5, after the word "found," which says:

That any person who shall be injured in his business or property by reason of anything forbidden in the antitrust laws, may sue therefor in any district court of the United States in the district in which the defendant resides or is found.

You will note that on page 20, at the end of section 1, the following language is used:

The word "person" or "persons" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

I have been told that the language used in these sections is the same language as that used in the Sherman antitrust law. I am informed that the same suggestion I now offer has been made by a distinguished judge who is dealing with this class of legislation and prosecutions under the antitrust law.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield, with regard to the last suggestion?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That last suggestion follows the words of the Sherman law, and I never heard any complaint about it:

The word "person" or "persons" wherever used in this act shall be deemed to include corporations and associations existing under or authorized by the laws of either the United States, the laws of any of the Territories, the laws of any State, or the laws of any foreign country.

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We simply copied the language of the Sherman law.

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand that; but let me proceed further for a moment. I want to call the attention of members of the committee to the fact that this law seeks to provide for an action, suit, proceeding, or trial in the judicial district where the corporation, as mentioned specifically in section 10, is an inhabitant. I want to call attention to the fact that a corporation is an inhabitant of the State where it gets its incorporation, and which it selects as its place of residence. Speaking for a moment with reference to the corporation as distinguished from the person, in section 10, when you use the language—

And also in any district wherein it may be found—

How are you going to find a corporation for the purposes of jurisdiction, not for the purposes of mere service? Of course you can find it by serving certain processes upon its agents, officers, or employees.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit an interruption right there?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. I would suggest that to correct the very matter you are driving at—because this is an attempt to give jurisdiction wherever the cause of action arises—you strike out the words "is found" and insert the words "has an agent." That will give service wherever the cause of action arises. Otherwise, if you leave it in this way, you will have to go to the home of the corporation.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] in that suggestion. I have before me the amendment suggested by an eminent judge, using somewhat similar language; but I believe that these suits, actions, and proceedings ought to be brought, in the case of a corporation, not only where it is an inhabitant by virtue of its incorporation, and not only against a person who is an inhabitant of a certain State, not only where that corporation or that person may have some agent in a remote district, but it ought to be brought where the corporation or the person is doing business and where the cause of action accrues.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. For instance, take a corporation or a person, inhabitant of New Jersey. They may be doing a small business in the State wherein they are incorporated, or where the individual is a citizen, and the principal business may be done in West Virginia or Colorado or in Missouri. Wherever the cause of action accrues, wherever the damage is done, wherever the witnesses are, there is the place where it ought to be at least permitted to be sued and trial to be had.

A New Jersey corporation or a West Virginia corporation may transact business in Missouri or in Colorado or in far-away California. There is where the wrongs may be done, where the violations of the law may be committed, and there is the evidence of these things; and they should not be compelled for the purposes of a trial to have suit brought in some far-away State or district, of which they are the inhabitant by virtue of the incorporation therein or selection of a residence therein. I think, after the word "found," there ought to be additional language such as I have offered in this section. I will ask the Clerk to read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 22, line 22, after the word "found," strike out the comma and insert the words "doing business and the cause of action may accrue."

Mr. DICKINSON. Now, one more suggestion. The same amendment, it seems to me, ought to follow the word "found" in section 5 and in section 10. The same language ought to follow where it provides for the prosecution of a corporation and the prosecution of the person taking into consideration the definition of the word "person." I do not ask to strike out any language of the committee, but simply to add to it, to make clear and definite and certain so that any person and any corporation may be sued not only where it has its residence as a corporation or individual, but that it can be sued wherever it is found doing business and the cause of action may arise.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman if he will not change the point at which he has offered his amendment. I thoroughly agree with him, but I think it ought to come in after the word "resides," line 22, page 22, so that it will read, "in which the defendant resides, does business, or is found."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I much prefer that the amendment finally agreed upon should come from the committee. I have no disposition to inject any amendment of my own or my personality into this bill, but I want such appropriate language as will make it certain and definite.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee how long he intends to run to-night. This is a hot day and we have been in session since 11 o'clock, and Members are getting tired.

Mr. WEBB. I hoped that we would get through with sections 5 and 6. I do not think there will be much opposition, and we think we can do it in 15 or 20 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I have before me a suggestion of an amendment which came from a distinguished representative of the Government, a distinguished judge, formerly a high official, in which he suggests the following words: It is to insert the words "in the district wherein the defendant may be doing business or have an agent, representative, or director." That does not seem to me to cover the situation entirely. The suit ought to be authorized to be brought against the corporation or person in the district of which he is an inhabitant or where the cause of action accrues and not merely where some agent or representative may be located remote from the point where the damage is done.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I will.

Mr. SCOTT. What is the gentleman's understanding of the word "found"; what is its import as used in this section?

Mr. DICKINSON. I understand that there is some decision by some court that I am not very familiar with that may possibly cover the very thought suggested by my proposed amendment. I do not believe that it meets the situation, and if there be any doubt about it, in order that the Government may prosecute successfully and institute suits and actions and have trials the language ought to be clear and definite, and so plain that he who runs may read, so that there can not be two constructions.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to make an explanation of this provision. It is one of the administrative features of the bill which has the approval of the Attorney General, who has been connected with some of these great trust suits, and this language was used to make this section conform to the existing law and enable him to have greater liberty in bringing these suits. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that that language has the approval of the Attorney General, and while of course that does not bind us, I think if we adopt any amendments to it, it should be after mature consideration.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, in response to that, I want to say again, as I said before, that I have no disposition to press any amendment suggested by me, and I want to repeat that I prefer that the amendment come from the committee in appropriate language. For that reason I do not care to further press the amendment at this time.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment, in line 22, after the word "or," to strike out the words "is found," and insert the words "has an agency."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 22, strike out the words "is found" and insert in lieu thereof the words "has an agency."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, that will make it read:

In which the defendant resides or has an agency doing business, and the cause of action may accrue.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Why strike out the words "is found"?

Mr. CULLOP. Because the words "is found" will not avail anything in serving a process or getting jurisdiction of the defendant, except at the place where the corporation resides. The word "found" as used there is vague and indefinite, and means nothing, so far as acquiring jurisdiction is concerned. But I can see that it will do no harm to leave them, and I shall at the proper time ask to modify the amendment in this respect.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. This act applies to persons as well as to corporations?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. And the words "is found" would certainly give you advantage in dealing with a person.

Mr. CULLOP. It may in such instance. But suppose a person lives in New Jersey, doing business there, how can jurisdiction of him be acquired in any Federal court in Colorado or Nevada? Suppose process is served on him, he will enter his appearance and move to quash the process, and answer that he was called into that jurisdiction by the process of some court. That defendant will never go into Colorado in such a way that he will be subject to a valid service, and if he was called there upon some public business he can quash the service, if it be made upon him, because when a man is compelled to go into a jurisdiction upon public business, you can not serve a process of the court on him and bring him into court and require him to answer a cause of action; but if he has an agency doing business there, then jurisdiction can be obtained over the corporation or the individual in the territory where the cause of action arises. But why insert the language "is found" in this without he has an agent? It may result, and more than likely will result, in a failure to acquire jurisdiction other than at the place where the corporation or individual resides.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Is it not true that in all the States foreign corporations are compelled to appoint a person at the capital for the very purpose of receiving service?

Mr. CULLOP. All that I know of. I thank the gentleman for the suggestion that he has made. In nearly every State there is a law, as the gentleman from Michigan suggests, requiring the corporation to appoint an agent for the purpose of serving process upon him, and if the corporation has no agent in my State the auditor of state is made the agent for that purpose; but now, if we undertake to limit the service of process upon the defendant to wherever it is found, we will never in all probability get jurisdiction in these cases except at the place of the home of the individual or the corporation. What objection could there be to inserting the language "or has an agent"? It will clarify the matter and make certain that which is now uncertain. The defendant can then be found to serve the process upon him; but if you do not do that, when and where will we find the defendant? In many instances only certain persons are delegated by the corporate acts or by-laws upon whom the legal service can be had. That person in such a case would never go into the territory where a cause of action arises, but he would send somebody else there, upon whom legal service could not be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULLOP. In such cases the defendant would always avoid sending the person in the territory upon whom process could be served, and get the defendant into court to answer any cause of action which might be brought, and the cause would go out of court on a plea in abatement. I am trying to have this made so jurisdiction can be secured by a service of process upon the agent, and when there is service upon the agent it will compel the corporation or individual to answer in court the cause of action, but by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri I fear no one will ever get one of them into court to answer a cause of action or respond to one. He will never be found, he will avoid being found, he will be in hiding, and the injured party will never get service upon him. If he does find him, he will be in a position to quash service for some reason known to some statute in that jurisdiction. Hence I ask the gentleman from Missouri to let the amendment that I have offered be inserted, so it will be of some real purpose to the people who may have occasion to bring suit under this statute, and not be, as it is now, that they will have to travel probably from California to New Jersey or New York to bring suit.

Mr. DICKINSON. I would like to make the inquiry would not the same objection the gentleman makes now apply to the statute where the corporation is an inhabitant by virtue of it having been incorporated there?

Mr. CULLOP. No; clearly not. Let us make this so there will be no avenue for escape.

Mr. DICKINSON. I want to say I have no objection to any additional language. I want to add additional words after the word "found," but I care not whether it be the language I have suggested or the additional language suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, but I really prefer that the committee in charge of this bill offer its own amendment complete and perfect it for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has again expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state that the provision written into the bill has the approval of the Attorney General, who is engaged in prosecuting these suits, and the purpose of it is to broaden the language so as to give the Government the widest latitude in securing service, and the amendments suggested are limitations upon that authority. The very broadest language that can be used in a statute of this kind conferring jurisdiction is to give the jurisdiction where the corporation resides or is found.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. This is not new language. I think this is language, in hæc verba, of section 7 of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. WEBB. This is absolutely taken from section 7 of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. CULLOP. Will the gentleman permit a question right there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Let me read the language of section 7. It says "in the district in which the defendant resides or is found," and, this being supplemental, it was intended to make it read and give it the same effect as in the Sherman law.

Mr. CULLOP. But "is found." A corporation does not move around; it is a stationary affair, and its residence is some place fixed in its articles of incorporation. Now, then, it is stationary. It is the agent who moves around, and then either the law or the by-laws of the corporation provide who are the persons upon whom service can be made to bring them into court; but if you fix it "any agent," as I have suggested, then you have it that wherever there is an agency in any State or District in the Union you can get a valid service if they have any such agent, and then you get it by the law, as most of the States have a statute.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman will permit, I desire again to call his attention to the fact that individuals may be guilty of violating this provision the same as corporations, and that individuals do not necessarily have agents, and it is necessary that we retain this provision in the bill as it is written, in order to give service upon individuals, and corporations are found wherever they are engaged in business and wherever they have agents.

Mr. CULLOP. But individuals doing an interstate business.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We have here a provision in reference to service that is incorporated in the original act which we are proposing to supplement, so why not follow the language of the Sherman Act in that regard, for that is all we do.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Has the Supreme Court ever passed on that language of the Sherman Act "is found"?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not think so. It is the language of the statute in my State and I think in many others.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman know in investigating this matter or has he run across any decision of the Supreme Court construing that language in the Sherman antitrust law?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I never did. I never heard of any complaint in regard to it, and in this bill the provisions with reference to service follow the original Sherman law. It has the approval of the Attorney General's office, and there never has been any difficulty about the interpretation of the Sherman law as to service. And so in passing supplementary legislation we should, I think, content ourselves in that regard with the terms of the Sherman law.

Mr. CULLOP. May I suggest to the gentleman from Arkansas that every suit which has arisen under the Sherman antitrust law has been brought at the home of the corporation itself, or at its principal place of business, and therefore there was no occasion to construe this language, "is found," which is ambiguous and uncertain. If you are to construe "is found," you will have to construe that as the place of the residence of the corporation, because it is not migratory. You can not get service upon some person traveling throughout the country and hold your jurisdiction throughout that territory.

Mr. CARLIN. Why should not the suit be brought in the habitat of the corporation? We have been successful so far in that matter.

Mr. CULLOP. In this case for the very best reason, I think. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CARLIN] now has disclosed the purpose of this language, and that is why I am combating it, and for the best of reasons, I think. I do not want to make a resident of California come to Trenton, N. J., to bring a suit for violation of this law, but I want him to sue at home in the jurisdiction where the cause of action arose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, other gentlemen have taken my time, and I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr Chairman, merely for the purpose of a question, I want to ask the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas whether some similar amendment has not been suggested by a distinguished representative of the Government now engaged in prosecution under the Sherman antitrust law, extending the language, after the word "found," so as to make it clear and certain?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. There has been such a suggestion made by Mr. Dickinson, who is now engaged in prosecuting the Steel Trust for the Government. But this language is broader than the language you contend for. I contend when you leave the words "is found" in the law you can get service on an individual anywhere within the jurisdiction in which he happens to be found and upon a corporation in any place where it is doing business or has an officer or agent upon whom service may be had; and the words of the proposed amendment are words of limitation.

As this is supplementary legislation to the Sherman law, I would ask some of these distinguished gentlemen to explain to me what reason or what policy would require or justify that we should provide one rule as to service under the original law which we do not repeal nor modify in that regard, and a different rule for bringing suits under this supplementary law. The suggestion was made by the Attorney General, as I understand, so as to harmonize the provisions of the proposed law with those of the existing law and to give the Government the widest possible scope in getting service in these cases, and the provision is right as it is written and ought not to be changed.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says this gives the broadest scope possible for the bringing of suits against agents and others. Can the gentleman point out under the Sherman antitrust law any suit that has been brought against a corporation outside of the jurisdiction of its home?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I can not.

Mr. GARNER. If there has been no suit in these 20 years——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not say there has not. I say that I have not investigated that point.

Mr. GARNER. I was going to assume that there were no suits brought against a corporation except in the jurisdiction of its home, and the prosecuting officers must have assumed that was the only place they had jurisdiction or else there would have been some suit somewhere brought outside of the jurisdiction of the home of that corporation.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not deny or affirm that. I have not investigated that question.

Mr. GARNER. The very fact that there have not been any suits brought in these 20 years——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not admit there have not. I do not concede the fact stated.

Mr. GARNER. I was asking the gentleman that question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman will yield, I think that there are two suits pending in New York against foreign shipping lines for violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. You see in this——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] has again expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas have five minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, we have given the gentleman from Arkansas five minutes once or twice, and what do we find? He did not have five seconds of the time. Now, what a farce it is to give the gentleman from Arkansas five minutes and let some one else use the five minutes. Probably there is not another Member of this House who can explain or illuminate this question as the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], and Members who know nothing whatever of the subject can not get the benefit of what he has to say.

I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask this: You say it is provided in this that where the defendant is found——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Resides or is found.

Mr. CULLOP. Resides or is found?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, under that language you could not get jurisdiction of the defendant by serving process on an agent, unless you have fixed in the law that service upon the agent will give jurisdiction of the corporation. So that you add nothing whatever to this in any respect, except, as I take it, to fix the place of the residence of the corporation. I ask the gentleman, is it legal to serve process on an agent, and is jurisdiction obtained by such service, unless the law makes him an agent upon whom service of process will confer jurisdiction against the corporation?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. When does the time of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] begin? When did the gentleman take the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that his time is running now.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Indiana, I think it would be a very dangerous practice for us here, in the heat of debate, with differing opinions, to amend a provision relating to service of process, when the very language that is incorporated in this bill has been written in the existing law for 24 years, and there has never been any complaint from any source concerning it, nor any confusion about it; and when the Attorney General of the United States, who was heretofore connected with one of the most notable trust suits that has ever been brought and is now in control of all trust suits now pending, asks us to fix the service in this supplementary legislation in the exact words in which it is found in the existing law.

We followed his judgment. We believe we did right in following it, and we think this House will be wise in following his judgment, because we are not amending the Sherman law. We are merely supplementing it by additional legislation; and there it stands, just as it is written. We are proposing new and supplementary legislation, and in doing so you are proposing by these amendments offered to fix a different rule for service of process in this bill from that provided in the original act. Gentlemen talk about confusion. This would bring confusion. A person in bringing suit under the original Sherman law would obtain service wherever the person or corporation resides or is found, but in bringing suit under the supplementary legislation he would have to follow this new statute and the new rule relating to service injected into it. In the interest of harmony, and especially when there is no objection to the Sherman law in that regard, especially when the highest legal officer in this Government, charged with the enforcement of the law, has recommended it, we feel that we ought to bow to his judgment and reject the amendments proposed. We believe this House would do well to follow recommendations of your committee and leave the provisions relating to service as they are in the bill. The same language used here occurs in other sections further on in the bill. Why have two rules for service in the enforcement of the antitrust laws of this country? Why have one rule in the original Sherman law as it is written and another rule in the supplemental provisions thereto proposed in this bill, which are intended to broaden and extend the provisions of the Sherman Act, without attempting to curtail or cut short in any respect the virtue, power, and efficacy of that law as it is written?

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Would the gentleman favor a statute which would permit service on an agent?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I think you can get service on an agent under this provision. I do not know how you can sue a railroad corporation unless you get your service on an agent.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman finds, upon further investigation, that this provision would not permit it, then would the gentleman object to an amendment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If, on mature investigation, we find that any provision of this bill is defective in any way and will not carry out the purpose for which it is intended, I assure the gentleman that nobody will be more willing to accept such an amendment than your committee; but I appeal to you not to change these provisions hastily, in the heat of debate. I think the provisions relating to service properly drafted as they appear in the bill, and that the proposed amendment and others suggested in the debate would narrow the scope of the provisions as drawn. I hope that the amendment will be rejected and that section 5 will not be amended, as the words objected to are a verbatim copy of language used in section 7 of the Sherman Act, proposed for reenactment here so as to make this supplementary legislation harmonize with the existing law.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I believe the language both in the Sherman law and in this particular section was advisedly used. I think some of the gentlemen on the other side have forgotten some of the occasions when they found it necessary to look up the decisions on this question. It is not a new or unsettled question. The expression "found" as used in connection with Federal jurisdiction of corporations means where the corporation is doing business. A corporation must submit the jurisdiction of the Federal court either in the home of the corporation, which is the State that creates it, or in some other district or State where it is found doing business. And that does not mean merely where it has an agent or an agency, because many times corporations have an agent or an agency in a State and is not doing business within the jurisdiction clauses of the statutes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does it not occur to the gentleman that since this bill contemplates suits may be brought by private individuals, that they be permitted to bring suit where the wrong is done and follow the old rule of procedure?

Mr. SCOTT. You could not adopt any method that would introduce more confusion into the law than that, because the question as to where the cause of action accrued is very often one of great difficulty to decide. It is a matter over which State statutes have no control.

The statute, as suggested by the gentleman from Indiana, of his State could have no effect of conferring jurisdiction on the Federal courts. While I do not think it would harm the section to say "found doing business," because that is what the expression means, it would introduce confusion to use the expression "agent or agency," because that has no limitations in the Federal decisions up to the present time. The expression "found doing business" has become fairly well defined.

The gentleman from Indiana is again mistaken when he says that there have been no suits brought to enforce the Sherman antitrust law except at the home of the corporation. I hope he has not forgotten the great Beef Trust prosecutions—a New Jersey corporation was a defendant—which were tried out in Chicago.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does the gentleman believe that if a private individual in California, wronged by a corporation that has its domicile in New York, was forced to resort to the courts in New York you would practically deprive that man of an opportunity, if he was an ordinary citizen, of pursuing the remedy which the law provided?

Mr. SCOTT. You do not do that, because he could always bring suit in California if he can find anyone upon whom to serve process. He brings it in the State court, and the corporation at once takes it to the Federal court. That has been the history and procedure.

Mr. DICKINSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON. Take a New Jersey corporation doing business in Texas and doing business in Illinois. It may commit no violation of the law, no wrong, no damage in Texas; and if so, a suit ought not to be brought there. If this same corporation does some one an injury, does do damage in Illinois, ought not the suit to be brought there? I give the widest liberty of bringing suits where the damage is done and where the action arose. My amendment seeks to be fair both to the corporation and to the person and to the plaintiff.

Mr. SCOTT. I could not conceive that anything would deprive the plaintiff of his right to choose the place of trial if he so desired, either in the district where found or where the corporation resides.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is full of ambiguities. The trouble with it is that it will take 20 years to decide what it means, as it did the Sherman antitrust law. The discussion of this bill here has proved conclusively how dangerous it is to interfere with the business relations and rights of citizens all over the country. I claim that these provisions in this bill at the present time are disastrous to the business of the United States. Let me read to you a resolution or petition made by three of the largest manufacturing associations in the world:

> We, the undersigned, representing the National Implement and Vehicle Association, the Ohio Manufacturers' Association, and the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, in which States the manufacturing industry represents 33,164 factories, employing 1,084,000 employees, with an annual pay roll of $782,365,000, desire to cooperate with the Congress in legislation which will eliminate business abuses.
> We favor an interstate trade commission properly regulated, but we are opposed to all legislation which is discriminatory, and we ask that all other business legislation be deferred until the business men of the United States can become acquainted with the proposed laws, of which they are now entirely ignorant.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr HAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. SENATE.

FRIDAY, May 29, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we make mention of Thy name with reverence and godly fear. We would not degrade our own nature and corrupt our own mind by taking Thy name vainly upon our lips. We come to Thee, the author of all our freedom, the sphere in which we have our largest life, the center and source of all our blessing, and at the mention of Thy name we bow our body and mind and heart before Thy throne. We acknowledge the sovereignty of no man over our intellectual life, but our largest freedom is in the surrender of our minds and hearts to God. Grant us this day that perfect liberty which is found in conformity to the will of our Maker and our Father. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

STRIKE SITUATION IN COLORADO.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. THOMAS. I may say that the document just offered is one I neither indorse nor disaffirm. I do not pretend to stand sponsor either for the statements or the conclusions which are therein outlined.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE STRIKE SITUATION IN COLORADO.

[A report of the special committee appointed to investigate and report to Kensington Council, No. 19, Junior Order United American Mechanics, Denver, Colo. Unanimously adopted May 19, 1914.]

DENVER, COLO., May 19, 1914.

To the officers and members of Kensington Council, No. 16, Junior Order United American Mechanics:

Your committee, appointed to investigate the strike situation in this State, and to prepare a statement in relation thereto, would respectfully make the following report:

Kensington Council, No. 16, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Denver, Colo., is a patriotic fraternal society. Its only interest in the present strike controversy is as to its effect upon the public welfare. Its membership is composed of professional men, workingmen, and business men, but, so far as we know, not a single member of the council is interested as employee, attorney, employer, or in any other capacity, either directly or indirectly, with either of the parties to the strike controversy now raging in this State.

We feel, therefore, that we have the opportunity and that it is our right and duty to give to the order and to the world an account of causes and effects, past, present, and future, of this ill-starred controversy, and also to submit some reflections as to the remedy.

COLORADO'S COAL FIELDS.

Colorado is a great coal State. We have more than 11,000,000 acres of coal lands, of which by far the greater part still belongs to the United States Government; 473,000 acres belong to the State of Colorado, as trustee for the school fund and other funds. Of these 473,000 acres belonging to the State less than 14,000 are under lease, and of the 14,000 leased to private parties only 5,500 acres are productive. Less than 3 per cent of the vast coal acreage of Colorado is held in private ownership. Less than 5 per cent of the total tonnage of coal mined in Colorado is from lands belonging to the State. The two greatest fields are popularly called the northern and southern, and they are both nonunion. The unions have, however, looked upon these great fields, employing in normal times about 13,000 men, with avaricious eyes, and have made many attempts to unionize them. In the fall of 1913 emissaries of the union were sent here from Indiana, West Virginia, and other States, and all the power of the United Mine Workers was focused upon the southern fields, and a strike was ordered.

The operators declared that they could get along very well without the union men, and soon, following their usual tactics on such occasions, the union men began to beat up and even to kill nonunion workmen, and on October 28 the National Guard was sent into the district to keep the peace. This they did for six months with the loss of but two lives, one by accident, and the other killed while resisting arrest with arms in his hands, neither being union men.

April 17, 1914, the troops, with the exception of 34 men left at Ludlow, were withdrawn, because the State auditor had thrown every possible obstacle in the path to prevent the payment of the troops or of providing for their support in the field.

Immediately upon their withdrawal pillage, arson, and murder broke out in their most horrible form. April 20 [illegible] the battle of Ludlow.

THE BATTLE OF LUDLOW.

The strikers' tent colony at Ludlow was an armed camp under strict control of the union leaders, and was peopled by a class of persons graphically described in the report of the military commission as "ignorant, lawless, and savage south European peasants." They spoke 20 or more different languages, and most of them could not speak English at all. While they were of many nationalities, the Greeks predominated, especially as a fighting force.

The tent colony was purposely so located as to command an unobstructed view of the railroad depot near at hand, where workingmen were obliged to get on and off the trains. The conduct of the strikers during the winter was such that it was necessary to send a detail of soldiers to meet every train, in order to protect the nonunion men from physical violence.

No man wishing to leave the colony and go to work could do so except under guard of the State troops, and during the winter over a hundred men were in this way taken from the tent colony under military guard at their own request.

April 20 a detail of men was sent in the usual manner to rescue a men who had called for help to get away, and, as usual, the negotiations were had with Louis Tikas. This time, for some reason, the man was not given up, and instead the Greeks took to the hills and appeared to be preparing for action, while the women and children ran to the shelter of a deep gulch north of the colony. There were only 34 soldiers on duty, and they were scattered in small groups, most of them being 2 or 3 miles away. Tikas went back to his Greeks, promising to call them back to the colony, but failed to do so. The soldiers saw the Greeks running to the hills and taking possession of vantage points around them, but their officers would not allow them to fire until the strikers first opened fire on them. This is one of the many instances showing that while the soldiers suffered from all the dangers and liabilities of war they were prevented from taking advantage of its privileges. Had the soldiers been free to fight their enemies, the Greeks would never have reached the hills and the battle would have been much shorter. As it was, when the firing from the Greeks had lasted long enough to show that they really meant business the troops returned it, and then these 34 soldiers fought and held at bay several hundred foreigners from 10 a. m. until 2 p. m., when reinforcements began to arrive, though at the most there were only about 120 soldiers engaged. The number of strikers engaged has been variously estimated at from 400 to 800 men. They were heavily armed with the latest and best models of high-power rifles, although their leaders had solemnly assured the State government that they had surrendered their arms. They used explosive bullets and so-called "poisoned" bullets (both expressly forbidden by the rules of civilized warfare), and some of their ammunition was manufactured in Greece. They were amply supplied with ammunition, over 15,000 rounds having been found in John Lawson's tent after the battle.

When the reinforcements arrived the soldiers began to press forward and steadily drove the Greeks back until they took a range of sand hills where a soldier named Martin was wounded. The fire of the Greeks was concentrated upon this position, and the soldiers were unable to hold the hills. There were but four men in the detachment with

Martin, and they were unable to carry him across the exposed ground, so they placed him in a depression in the hills where he would be safe from the fire from both sides and retreated.

HEROIC RESCUE WORK.

Another detachment fought its way up to the tent colony where they heard the cries of women and children. The tents had caught fire before the soldiers arrived, but when they heard the cries of the women and children they rushed in among the burning tents and rescued between 25 and 30 and carried them away to safety. While engaged in this humane work they were under constant fire from the Greeks. To save these women and children the soldiers, while still under fire from the Greeks, were obliged to tear up tent floors, which had been nailed down over the openings to the pits, and drag the cowering occupants out by main force. Then these soldiers, who had had no pay for three months, took up a collection among themselves and raised $18 that night for the relief of these suffering women and children.

Late in the afternoon the sand hills were retaken by the soldiers, who then found the body of their comrade Martin with his head blown off and his limbs broken. This barbarity shocked and infuriated them, and, of course, it was immediately reported to Lieut. Linderfeldt. A few minutes after this Louis Tikas was captured, after he had been fighting all day with his Greeks. Acting under the frightful stress of that all day's battle, where the strikers numbered almost 20 to 1, without water, food, or rest for nine hours, and with the report of the atrocities committed upon the body of his comrade Martin fresh in his mind, Lieut. Linderfeldt is reported to have committed the unsoldierlike offense of striking a prisoner. Whether this be true or not time will determine, and whether if true the excuse is sufficient can only be known when all the facts and circumstances are developed. But at least the provocation was great.

NO "MASSACRE OF THE INNOCENTS."

There was, however, no firing on women and children, unless it were firing by the Greeks on the little Snyder boy, who was killed by a striker's bullet and who was the only child killed or even struck by a bullet. Both sides agree also that no woman was struck by a bullet from either side. The 13 women and children who were suffocated in the tiny pit under the ground not large enough for 3 of them to remain in for three hours and live, were probably dead long before the tents caught fire. But in any event the soldiers could not possibly have been to blame in the slightest degree. The strikers had rifle pits in front of the colony tents, and were hidden in the arroyo or gulch behind them and were firing on the soldiers from both places. The strikers could easily have retreated from both rifle pits and from the arroya and still have continued the fight on equally as good terms from some other vantage point, but they elected not to do so.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN AS A SHIELD.

The death of these women and children was a most regrettable incident of this unfortunate battle in this inexcusable war, but the Greeks started the war and commenced the battle. They also were in a position to know that the women and children were in the underground pits, while the soldiers were not in a position to even suspect such a thing. Among civilized peoples when the men go out to war they first put women and children in places of safety, instead of leaving them exposed to all the dangers of battle, and in this case, as the soldiers had seen the women and children running to the arroya, where they would be absolutely safe, they naturally supposed and had a right to suppose that they were all out of danger. The Greeks, who must have known that some women and children were left in the colony, could have retreated from the colony or could easily have changed the place of fighting to another point, and either maneuver would have stopped the battle or have changed the line of fire, so that the women and children left in the tents would have been safe. They chose, however, to do neither, but to continue the fight in a place which made it necessary for the firing to endanger the lives of their own women and children.

The fault, then, rests squarely upon the shoulders of the strikers themselves and not upon the members of the National Guard who were stationed there to uphold the constitution and laws of the State, who were attacked by overwhelming numbers, and who were fighting for their lives as well.

It is inconceivable to suppose that 34 men, scattered in three or four groups, would deliberately attack a very much larger force, as well armed and better fortified than they were themselves.

The wonder is that these 34 men should have been able under any circumstances to have defended themselves successfully against their desperate assailants. It is another great tribute to the splendid fighting material composing our National Guard.

MACHINE GUNS.

The troops had two machine guns, one of which they used all day and the other from about 4 p. m. These guns were never turned on the tent colony itself, but were used against the Greeks intrenched in the sand hills and rifle pits and along the railroad tracks.

Admiral Fletcher threatened to destroy Vera Cruz with the great cannon of the American fleet unless snipping from the house tops were stopped.

RETURN OF THE NATIONAL GUARD.

The main body of the National Guard, who had been returned to their homes, were called back to the field on April 22, and although they had had no pay for three months and the families of many of them were suffering from the actual necessities of life they loyally took up their duty again, and if the ill-advised truce had not been made on the 24th peace would have been quickly reestablished by the swift defeat of the strikers. As it was, the strikers took advantage of the so-called truce to burn and destroy half a dozen mines and to murder many citizens of the State, the troops being compelled by the terms of the truce to do nothing to protect either life or property.

Then came the call for the Federal troops, two or three desperate battles between the strikers and the National Guard brought on by the determination of the strikers to destroy the remaining mines in the district, the defeat and surrender of the strikers to the National Guard, the arrival of the Federal troops, and the withdrawal of the State troops from the strike districts. It is perhaps worthy of note that this so-called truce, as well as the final surrender of the miners, was negotiated by a leading lawyer of Denver with as much nonchalance as though he were drawing a stipulation for the continuance of a petty case in a justice court.

FOUNDATION OF THE GOVERNMENT.

This Nation was founded upon the eternal principles of freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom to worship God, and freedom of labor. Freedom of labor means that the laborer himself shall be permitted to choose whether he shall work or not, where he shall work, the kind of work he shall engage in, and who his employer shall be. All these matters to be decided by the laborer for himself and not by some one else for him.

Certain ignorant, ill-advised, and vicious people have willfully and maliciously misinterpreted these rights, deeming freedom of speech as license to malign their neighbors, freedom of the press as license to distort the news and to besmirch and befoul this country and its institutions, deeming freedom to worship God as license to persecute, torture, and even to kill those who worship him in a different way, and deeming freedom of labor as being license to forcibly prevent other men from working.

Labor agitators have for many years preached, taught, and practiced, not only in Colorado but in every State in the Union, the doctrine that a labor union can not only work or quit work as it pleases—which is its inalienable right—but that a labor union can also rightfully prevent other men from working, and that in order to prevent other men from working the union men have the right not only to use peaceful persuasion but also to use physical violence upon those other workingmen, to burn and destroy their houses, to kill them by secret assassination or open murder, and that in their warfare against nonunion men the union men have the right to openly fight the duly constituted authorities of both State and Nation and to defy and insult the flag of our country.

AGITATORS, NOT WORKERS.

These labor agitators are not workers themselves, but are mere parasites on workingmen's organizations, and they have for many years taught their deluded followers class distinctions, class hatred and prejudice, and have encouraged class war, and people who ought to know better have blindly encouraged them in their false teachings.

They talk of "industrial war" as glibly and gleefully as though great enterprises were built up by the burning and destruction of property, and as though men would be attracted to enterprises in which they are daily in danger of assassination.

To them the destruction by violence of a factory or plant is but an incident in the carrying on of their "industrial war." These acts of violence indeed are a very important and helpful factor in their campaigns for raising money.

These labor agitators under different names, in Pennsylvania as Molly Maguires, in Idaho and Colorado as the Western Federation of Miners, and now as the United Mine Workers, have openly taught and freely practiced the use of force, even though it lead to murder, as proper means of inciting class hatred and class war.

The confession of the McNamaras as to the blowing up of the Times Building in Los Angeles and other wholesale destruction of properties by dynamiters as the hired agents of the Structural Steel Workers illustrates their method of procedure.

This present trouble in Colorado was deliberately brought about not because of any conditions in the mines but by these same labor agitators who are not workers and who seek to prevent others from working.

That they are mere labor agitators with no intention or desire to work or to plan work for others is shown by the fact that Gov. Ammons last fall offered to the United Mine Workers thousands of acres of unused coal lands belonging to the State at 10 cents per ton royalty, which was the lowest price, but the Mine Workers were not courteous enough even to make any response or to take any interest in the matter.

This business of organizing unions, fomenting strikes, and especially of preparing for the use of violence and of accustoming their members to the idea of killing nonunion men is a profession in itself.

The labor leaders in this trouble are not miners, and very few of them are residents of Colorado. They have been imported into the State, and especially into the strike districts, for the purpose of inciting strikes and of directing hostilities against the authorities.

Louis Tikas never was a miner himself, but was brought from Denver to the strike district and employed by the miners' union as interpreter and leader of the Greeks. These Greeks are reputed to be in large numbers veterans of the late war between Greece and Turkey. If this be true, under our immigration laws they ought to be deported as undesirable citizens. Certainly this suggestion can not be considered intemperate. Men who come to the United States and who take up arms against it and who, before they have learned to speak the English language, murder citizens of the State, are surely undesirable citizens and ought to be sent back to the land from which they came, and the Federal Government which permitted their importation owes it to the State of Colorado to take them away from us.

NOT A COLORADO PROBLEM.

In this connection we can not too strongly impress upon the country that this is not a Colorado matter, but purely an interstate or national affair. The trouble did not originate in Colorado, nor is it officered or financed here. The miners' union headquarters is at Indianapolis, Ind., and from there have come the orders, the leaders, and the money to support this movement, which is not merely a war against Colorado, and which does not simply mean war against the United States, but which in its essence and ultimate aim is war against organized society everywhere. Their purpose is not confined to the destruction of authority here, but their real purpose is to destroy authority everywhere. This is a very strong statement, but the history of the movement bears it out in full.

W. T. Hickey, secretary of the State Federation of Labor, telegraphed Congressman KEATING in commenting on the situation and as a protest, "we take this to mean that they (the coal companies) will have protection of the Federal troops." He says this as though he considered it a crime for the Federal troops to protect the coal companies. His protest against protection for the companies shows that he knows that they have need of protection from some one, and from whom could it be except from him and his lawless companions? We predict that if the coal companies or their workmen are protected by the Federal troops, the strikers will dig up the guns they do not even pretend they have surrendered and commence war upon the United States just as they have been making war upon Colorado.

Many outside papers, taking their cue from the position of our local papers, have called this striker's war, with its deplorable violence and loss of life, "The shame of Colorado." It should more properly be called "The shame of labor unionism" and "The shame of the United States."

We can not too strongly insist that this is not in any sense a Colorado question. We are the focus of all eyes to-day, because to-day the striker's war is here, but to-morrow it may be in West Virginia or Ohio or Pennsylvania or Michigan or any other State.

The shame, the suffering, the disgrace, and the fear that Colorado suffers to-day may to-morrow be borne by any State against which the United Mine Workers of America may turn its attention. The pretext here is one thing, the pretext for the next outbreak may be another; but always the real cause is the fixed determination that the unions shall control affairs in all industrial pursuits and that the laws of the labor union shall take precedence over the laws of the land.

ABUSE OF THE NATIONAL GUARD.

Nor should too much stress be laid upon abuse of the National Guard by the strikers and their allies. These unions have for many years carefully promulgated a sentiment of hatred for soldiers, whether of the Regular Army or of the National Guard, and have even gone to the extent of declaring in their own constitutions that a man can not belong to both the union and to the Army, even as musicians. They also occupy the same attitude toward the police and sheriffs and their deputies and all other peace officers. Their opposition is not to any particular form of authority, but to authority of any kind.

DEPRAVED LEADERS, BRUTAL FOLLOWERS.

Practically all of the miners involved in this strike are ignorant, depraved, and brutal foreigners, peasants from the lowest and most hopeless class of the peoples of southern Europe, who know little and care less for the principles of free government. By a mistaken national policy men of this type have been permitted to invade this country at the rate of over a million a year, so that now they number in our midst many millions, all herded together in industrial centers and who threaten with their low ideals and base habits of life to destroy our civilization as the Huns and Vandals of old destroyed the civilization of ancient Rome and set the world back a thousand years during which rich and poor alike suffered from the horrors of poverty, superstition, and oppression.

These ignorant, depraved, and brutal foreigners are led by better educated, but as depraved and brutal officers, who are usually of a foreign extraction, as far removed from American ideals of freedom of speech, freedom of worship, freedom of labor, and freedom of government as are these later importations of ignorant herds whom the leaders incite to deeds of violence the leaders themselves are too cowardly to commit. These men, depraved leaders and brutal followers together, number but two or three thousand, and while exercising their own undoubted right to refuse to work, have denied to more than 10,000 of their fellow men the right to work.

The 10,000 workers have as much right to work as the 2,000 idlers have to be idle.

ATROCITIES UNSPEAKABLE.

The strikers here, as everywhere else, endeavor by intimidation, by violence, and by assassination to enforce their unlawful and unjust edict that the workers must quit their work. The lawful authorities of Colorado, acting under their sworn duty, endeavored to protect peaceable workingmen in their right to work and in their right to live. The strikers, denying both rights, defied the Government and made open war against it. This is no exaggeration. They actually issued and published an open and formal declaration of war against Colorado and made a call for troops. They enlisted men to fight against Colorado; they drilled these men into armies; they marched these armies from place to place; these armies fought battles against the State troops; they killed Colorado soldiers, occasionally in open battle, but more often by assassination. They deliberately and treacherously murdered a hospital surgeon while wearing his Red Cross uniform and while performing his duty of ministering to a wounded man. After their leaders had made a solemn treaty and had agreed to a temporary truce these strikers openly marched across the country burning and destroying property and murdering Colorado's citizens. They have driven men, women, and children into mines and have deliberately and intentionally destroyed the shafts and openings with the intention of killing them by fire and suffocation. They have set fire to boarding houses and purposely burned alive unoffending and noncombatant workingmen. They have been guilty of atrocities unspeakable and innumerable.

They are even now standing in flagrant defiance of the authority of the Government of the United States and are treating, negotiating, and haggling with the officers of the Army as to the conditions and terms on which they will agree to surrender their arms.

TREASON.

Our Constitution defines treason as "levying war against the State or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid or comfort."

Under this definition all these strikers, but especially their officers and leaders, as well as those disloyal State officials who are in league with them, and also those newspapers, women's organizations, and Christian citizenship unions "adhering to them and giving them aid and comfort" are, all of them, guilty of treason against the State, and that in its most heinous form.

The law of organized society has ever been and must ever be that whoever raises his hand against the Government is a traitor and must pay the penalty with his life. In no other way can organized government exist. Whoever complains of wrongs in existing laws must turn his attention to their correction by peaceful means. He who attempts to correct his own wrongs by force is a criminal. He who attempts to correct the wrongs of society by force is a traitor.

We speak of this organization as armies, with no idea of dignifying them or the purpose of their being, but only for the purpose of indicating their size and deliberate purpose. In reality they were frenzied mobs, drunk with the lust for blood, who rushed from mine to mine burning and destroying property, murdering men and mutilating their dead bodies like wild beasts or brutal barbarians, and respecting neither flag of truce, Red Cross, nor any of the rules of civilized warfare.

In all these acts of treason, murder, pillage, and arson the strikers have been aided, abetted, and encouraged by newspapers as venal and truckling as the strikers are depraved and vicious, and by State officials who, by reason of their betrayal of their oaths of office and of their duty as officials, are more guilty of these treasons and assassinations than are the ignorant, misguided strikers whom these officials and newspapers have by their appeals to passion and prejudice influenced to commit the actual deeds of violence.

By reason of the reign of terror established by these strikers, agitators, and newspapers freedom of speech and freedom to work have been in a large measure denied to the people of Colorado.

The strike has more or less completely involved seven different coal-mining districts, some of them 400 miles apart, and in which are over a hundred mines, each of which must have its detail of soldiers to insure protecton. There are also many towns, railroad bridges, and other properties all subject to attack and destruction.

GOOD WORK OF THE NATIONAL GUARD.

The Colorado National Guard has served in these strike districts with less than half the number of men demanded by the Regular Army officers for the same purposes. They were not furnished with sufficient clothing or supplies, they received no pay for over three months by reason of the worse than treasonable actions of our State auditor and other officials, and they were denied that moral support from press and people that a Nation's troops are entitled to in time of war. In spite of all these difficulties our State troops for six months maintained absolute peace, quiet, and safety in the strike districts without loss of life on neither side and without loss of property of any kind to anyone. Under the most trying circumstances, subjected daily to the vilest abuse of the most brutal of men and of women almost as brutal, they conducted themselves with a dignity, decorum, and sense of military duty worthy of the highest commendation and praise.

COMMENDATION AND DENUNCIATION.

In view of all these facts, conditions, and circumstances we call upon the country to revise and to reverse its opinion of the government and troops of the State of Colorado, and to commend them for their efforts to properly solve a question that did not originate here, but has been thrust upon us by the attitude of the country at large upon the questions of labor and immigration. We call upon Congress to immediately pass the Burnett bill, which will, in large measure, prevent the immigration to this country of these illiterate, depraved, and criminal hordes which are now pouring into this land and who threaten its very life. The perpetuity of American institutions, the safety of life and property, and the protection of our own people are of greater importance to us and to the world than is the maintenance of a maudlin sentiment which permits the invasion of our country by ignorant hordes who know nothing of and who would ruthlessly destroy its beneficent institutions.

We most heartily commend Gen. John Chase, commanding, and the officers and men of our National Guard for their patient forbearance and soldierly attitude under the most trying and adverse conditions and circumstances.

We commend Gov. Ammons for his efforts to maintain law and order in the community.

We most severely denounce those disloyal State officials whose weakness and treachery tied the governor's hands and gave aid and comfort to enemies of the State.

We as severely denounce those newspapers which by their inflammable articles and comments, and by their prejudiced and distorted reports, have attempted to place the blame where it does not belong, have defamed and humiliated Colorado and its government, both civil and military, and have excused, justified, and been potent factors in inciting those deeds of violence that have disgraced the past and which now endanger the future of the State.

We as warmly commend those newspapers that have told the truth and have bravely stood for law and order.

We can not find words strong enough to express our horror and detestation of those infamous men and hysterical women who as leaders and advisers of their ignorant followers, or as their defenders and apologists, are the real traitors and murderers in this frightful strikers' war. Their words and their deeds are ineradicable blots on the pages of the history of our State and of our civilization.

PEACE BEFORE PROSPERITY.

There must be peace before there can be prosperity. There must be order in the community and safety for life and limb before we can turn our attention to the correction of existing wrongs. Violence begets violence and must be repressed by the stern hand of organized society.

The Good Book tells us that if a man will not work, neither shall he eat. We contend that if a man will not work, if he prefers that his wife and children shall starve, he at least shall not be permitted to kill and murder other men who do wish to work in order to save their wives and children from starvation.

It is no longer a question as to whether nonunion men shall be allowed to work in Colorado; it is now a question as to whether or not any man shall be allowed to live without permission from the labor union.

WARS FOR FREEDOM.

Fifty years ago we fought a great war in this country to establish the right of a man not to be compelled to work for another unless he wished to do so.

Now we are facing a threatened war which we must fight to establish the right of a man to work for another if he wishes to do so.

That war was fought to free men from slavery to private individuals. This war, if it comes, and it seems as though come it must, will have to be fought to free men from slavery to private organizations.

Both the slaveholding individual before the war and the slaveholding labor union of the present pretend that the slaves are being held for their own good, though against their own will, and both claim that if the slaves will not voluntarily submit to their masters they must be beaten into submission or killed. Both hypocritically claim that this is for the good of humanity.

TRUE THEORY OF EMPLOYMENT.

The true theory is that every employer shall be allowed to employ whom he pleases, and every employee shall be allowed to work for whom he pleases, so that employer and employee are agreed as to the terms and conditions of the employment. Any other principle is a denial of freedom to the individual, and a denial of freedom is the essence of slavery.

FUNDAMENTAL PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT.

We reaffirm in the most positive terms and as the fundamental principles of popular and free government:

First. The right to worship God, every man in his own way.

Second. The right of free speech, with responsibility for the abuse of this right.

Third. The right of labor to be free from any master, religious, personal, corporate, or union.

Fourth. The right of capital to the safety of its investments, and that it be subject to no tyranny of private organization, but only to the majesty of the law.

Fifth. The right of every man to protection by the State of his life, his limbs, and his property.

Sixth. The impartial enforcement of every law, whether it be for the protection of labor or for the protection of property.

Seventh. Swift, sure, and severe punishment for all offenses against the law, and especially of such high crimes as treason and murder.

We call upon all good and patriotic citizens to stand ready to uphold these fundamental rights with every power of voice, pen, and vote, with every ounce of strength and every drop of blood, with every power that organized and civilized society can bring to bear.

In this way, and in this way only, can our fair State, our beautiful country, our boasted civilization, our ancient rights, and even our lives be saved.

POLYGAMY.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have been requested to bring forward a petition and to ask that it be read in the open Senate. I desire that to be done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petition will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE ERWIN COTTON MILLS CO.,
West Durham, N. C., May 11, 1914.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

Whereas the Mormon Church teaches the divine sanction of polygamy, and its prophet and many of its priests practice that crime; and

Whereas the political powers of the Mormon Church nullifies the operation of the local laws in these sections of this country where Mormon polygamy exists:

Now, therefore, we, citizens of the United States, in public assemblage convened, do respectfully urge upon Congress the speedy adoption of the pending resolution to amend the Constitution so that it shall forbid the existence of polygamy and polygamous cohabitation anywhere in the United States of America.

Done at Durham, N. C., May 11, 1914.

E. R. LEYBURN, Chairman.
W. A. ERWIN, Secretary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I have observed several times during the present session that communications of this character have been received. I had not intended to pay any attention to them; but they indicate that some sort of a propaganda is at work in the country upon this subject.

I desire to say that the good people who send these communications are misinformed about conditions in Utah. Polygamy is absolutely abandoned there, and has been abandoned for many years. Some remnant of it remains, it is true. Some of the people who entered into these relations many years ago still continue to maintain their households. There are cases where these old men and old women, who were married many years ago, still continue to maintain those relations; but the system of polygamous marriage, so far as the present and the future are concerned, has disappeared.

In that connection I desire to call attention to a recent statement made by Bishop F. S. Spalding, bishop of the Episcopal Church in the State of Utah. Bishop Spalding has lived in that State for many years. He is a very fair man. He has strenuously opposed the theological teachings of the Mormon Church, and of course is very strongly opposed to polygamy.

In the course of a statement made by him in February, 1914, he says, speaking of these attacks:

So vitriolous has the attack on Mormonism been and so much interest has been aroused throughout the whole country that every missionary from Utah is expected to present new evidence of polygamy, treason, and even white slavery. There are societies and individual lecturers busy supplying this demand. The National Reform Association, of which James S. Martin, D. D., is general superintendent, with offices in Pittsburgh, Pa., held a reception to ex-Senator Frank J. Cannon in Philadelphia on February 5 of this year. The invitation sent to leading citizens read as follows:

"Open defiance of law, the teaching of treason, the multiplying of polygamous marriages, the most aggressive proselyting now progressing in the world—these compel attention to the Mormon Church and organized action against it."

A careful man, cognizant of the facts, would have to qualify every one of those statements. The people in Utah are law-abiding; the charge of treason depends on a part of the temple ritual, which may be as much a dead letter as parts of the Anglican Liturgy. The old temple oath to revenge the death of the prohpet is undoubtedly repeated by the majority of Mormons with a mental reservation. Not only are polygamous marriages not multiplying, but polygamy was never practiced by the Mormons to the extent popularly supposed; and if the churches are even half awake they have nothing to fear from the proselyting efforts of 2,000 Mormons scattered over the earth, most of whom are schoolboys, who only know a few little speeches and a few Bible texts, and who look at the call to a mission quite as much as a chance to see the world as to convert it. The point I want to insist on most strongly is that we must be on our guard lest we yield to the temptation actually to regret that the Mormons are improving—to be almost sorry that we have lost our old thunder, because we can no longer honestly repeat the stories of the sensationalists, who are not held back by either truth or charity. It is high time that the same hopeful attitude was taken with reference to Mormonism as has been taken in regard to other religions which we as Christians consider inadequate. The thoughtful student of the great ethnic religions to-day tries to find points of contact and glimmerings of truth. The days in which interest in foreign missions was aroused by dreadful tales of brutality, lust, and ignorance have happily passed away, and the spiritual and ethical value in even the religions of the backward races is being recognized. The attitude toward the Mormon seems to be the sole exception to this more philosophical method of approach. We will surely be wiser and more Christian if we think that because the Latter-day Saints have so much truth they deserve more truth than to persuade ourselves that they have willfully rejected all truth and are steeped in lust and crime and are therefore utterly bad.

And further on he says:

The young Mormon does not want to practice polygamy. He may say that he believes in it as a doctrine, but he doesn't want to practice it himself. In the very nature of the case it is impossible to perpetuate polygamy in the twentieth century in the United States of America in the temperate zone. It is not fair to expect young Mormons to condemn polygamy, because in so doing they would condemn their own fathers and mothers. You ask, Why do they not strike out the polygamy section from "Doctrines and Covenants"? The answer is: For exactly the same reason that we can't get the 39 articles out of the prayer book. Ecclesiastical societies are always most conservative. It is harder to change church law, church ritual, church organization than any other social conventions. The dead letter must be very dead before it is buried. There are still hyper-Calvinists among the Presbyterians in spite of the revision of the Westminster confession; but if an ardent Methodist believer in free will spent time and money discovering as many as he could and then published the list and insisted that the revision of the Westminster confession was a piece of hypocrisy and that the Presbyterian Church really believed all that Jonathan Edwards preached at Stockbridge, his procedure would not be commended as loving and Christian. And yet must it not be admitted that this is just about what has been done in the case of the Mormons and polygamy?

Mr. President, I wish to say for myself that I know something about the conditions in Utah, and statements to the effect that polygamous marriages are still being celebrated there are utterly without foundation. I will venture to say that there are no more bigamous marriages in the State of Utah in proportion to the population—and I might go further and say not so many—as there are in the city of New York or in any of the eastern cities. Of course there are violations of law there, as there are violations of law everywhere; but from my knowledge of the situation and of the opinions and temper of the people I am quite sure that if the question could be presented to the Mormon people to-day whether or not they would return to the system of polygamous marriage and that question could be submitted to a vote of the membership of the church itself, and they could be assured that no interference would be had against them whatever they undertook to do, an overwhelming majority of the people themselves would vote against returning to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The petition will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3898) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the acquiring of rights of way by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1899, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 572) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3899) to provide for the acquiring of additional lands by railroad companies through Indian reservations, Indian lands, and Indian allotments, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 573) thereon.

LEASING OF OIL AND GAS LANDS.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5673) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, and their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, and I submit a report (No. 568) thereon. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to protect the locators in good faith of oil and gas lands who shall have effected an actual discovery of oil or gas on the public lands of the United States, or their successors in interest," approved March 2, 1911, be amended by adding thereto the following section:

"SEC. 2. That where applications for patents have been or may hereafter be offered for any oil or gas land included in an order of withdrawal upon which oil or gas has been discovered, prior to such application for patent, and where there has been no final determination by the Secretary of the Interior upon such applications for patent, said Secretary, in his discretion, may enter into agreements, under such conditions as he may prescribe, with such applicants for patents in possession of such land or any portions thereof relative to the disposition of the oil or gas produced therefrom or the proceeds thereof, pending final determination of the title thereto by the Secretary of the Interior, or such other disposition of the same as may be authorized by law."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 5434) to provide for the leasing of oil and gas lands withdrawn from entry, and I submit a report (No. 571) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let us first hear the bill read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will first read the bill.

The SECRETARY. The committee reports to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That upon relinquishment or surrender to the United States, within six months from the date of this act, by any locator or his successors in interest, of his or their claim to any unpatented oil or gas lands included in an order of withdrawal, upon which oil or gas had been discovered, was being produced, or upon which drilling operations were in actual progress October 3, 1910, or prior thereto, and were prosecuted until oil or gas was discovered, or have continued with reasonable diligence until the date of this act, and the claim to which land was initiated prior to July 3, 1910, the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, grant, on such reasonable terms and conditions as he may prescribe, to such locator or his successors in interest a permit to occupy the said lands so relinquished, and to extract the oil or gas therefrom, not exceeding, however, the maximum area of 2,560 acres to any one person, association, or corporation, said permit to be conditioned upon the payment by the permittee of a royalty of not exceeding one-eighth of the oil or gas extracted or produced from said premises, or of the proceeds thereof, each permit to continue so long as oil or gas can be extracted from said land in paying quantities.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts, and make such rules and regulations, as he may deem necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect, and all permits or assignments thereof shall be subject to such rules and regulations, and the failure of any permittee, or of his successors, to comply with the terms and conditions of the permit shall work a forfeiture of the same, to be declared by a court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. SUTHERAND. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada how much land will this bill apply to?

Mr. PITTMAN. How many acres in the United States?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know; it is impossible to state. It will apply to probably several hundred claimants.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Are they in different States?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; in different States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In what States?

Mr. PITTMAN. It would apply to lands in California, in Wyoming, and probably to some land in Idaho.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is not this a very important piece of legislation?

Mr. PITTMAN. This is not the general leasing bill, I will say to the Senator, but it is——

Mr. BRISTOW. I think it ought to go over and be considered with other bills of that kind. I do not think we ought to pass a bill of this importance through in a minute or two.

Mr. PITTMAN. I wish to state to the Senator from Kansas that this matter has been under consideration by the Committee on Public Lands for a long time. The committee appointed a subcommittee which went into it carefully, and it was taken up before the full Committee on Public Lands on Wednesday, and all the members of the committee who were present were unanimously in favor of it, and I think all members of the committee, even those not present, since reading the report are in favor of it.

The situation is simply this: There is under consideration before the Public Lands Committee a bill providing for a general leasing system of oil and gas lands. That is not this bill. In the State of California a very peculiar condition exists, a condition that requires immediate remedying, so we are told by the Secretary of the Interior and by those who appeared before the Committee on Public Lands to present these various matters.

The condition is this: In the oil fields of California practically half of that land is owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. by virtue of its railroad grants of every other section. A large portion of the land not owned by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. is owned by the Standard Oil Co. and the Santa Fe Railroad Co. The Government has instituted five suits as test suits. One of those suits involves the title to the Southern Pacific lands. Another one of those suits, as I am informed, involves the validity of certain withdrawals by presidential proclamation. Other cases involve the question of dummy locations; that is, locations originally by several individuals for the benefit of some one person.

While there are only five suits instituted, the questions raised in those five suits challenge the title to all other claimants whose locations are in a similar condition. Those who have been sued in the five suits are in a position where they can ask the court of equity to allow them to put up bonds and to proceed to mine the oil. Those whose titles are challenged, but against whom no suit has been instituted, have no remedy at all.

Now, let us see what the condition is. The great pipe-line companies there, which are owned by the Standard Oil Co. and by the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., will not transport the oil from these lands that are challenged, and the operators on those lands can not get their oil to market except through these pipe lines. The Standard Oil Co. says to these individual operators, "We will not take your oil, because if the Government should eventually prevail against you it may make us pay again for the same oil." The Southern Pacific Co. says the same thing. The result is that these independent operators are unable by reason of such a cloud on their title to dispose of their oil. The Southern Pacific Co. has its own pipe line, and although its title is challenged it pays no attention to the challenge, but takes its own oil through its own line to market. Although the title of the Standard Oil Co. is challenged on the same ground, it has its own pipe line and it takes its own oil to its market.

Now, then, the condition is such that the Southern Pacific Railroad Co., with its vast holdings, and the Standard Oil Co., with its vast holdings, are driving wells right along the line of these private operators and are pumping the oil from under the ground of these independent operators, and at the same time they are refusing to carry their oil out on the ground that their title is challenged. The Secretary of the Interior says that this means an ultimate loss not only to the independent operators but to the Government The bill simply provides that the Government may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, accept a surrender of all claims to title by these independent operators and in lieu of such surrender grant to them a lease upon the lands that they surrender at a royalty of 12½ per cent.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, if I understand the situation, these oil claims were located prior to the passage of the withdrawal act by Congress.

Mr. PITTMAN. They were.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The lands were withdrawn or attempted to be withdrawn by the Secretary of the Interior prior to the passage of the act. Is that the fact?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes, sir; that is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And the locations were made after that attempted withdrawal, but before the act of Congress?

Mr. PITTMAN. Prior to the act of Congress.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This bill is limited to that class of lands.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is entirely limited to that class of lands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I want to say to the Senator that, so for as I am concerned, if the bill is confined to those lands, I have no objection to it.

Mr. PITTMAN. That is all it extends to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am very much opposed to any general leasing proposition. I think the Government of the United States ought not to go into the business of leasing its lands. While, of course, it is within the constitutional power of the Government of the United States to lease its lands, if it pleases, I think it is against the spirit of the principles upon which the Federal Government was instituted.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think those lands ought to be open to settlement by private citizens in such a way that they may be merged into the property of the State as rapidly as possible, and I am utterly opposed to any sort of a general leasing system. I wanted to say that much so that my consent to the passage of the bill might not be misconstrued.

Mr. PITTMAN. The bill only provides for the compromise of lawsuits by virtue of which the Government and the independent operators are both losing. It is to compromise lawsuits, because the subject of litigation will not be in existence when such test suits are determined.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If I understand the situation, I think the people who located the oil lands ought to be permitted to perfect their title to the lands rather than to be given the right to lease them.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. It is in aid of a compromise.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. WORKS. These bills do not commit the Government to a general leasing system. If they did, I should sympathize with what has been said by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], because I think that is a very serious question which ought to be very carefully considered before we enter upon any system of that kind. This bill affects only certain operators in California, and they are the small operators who are about to be crowded out on account of litigation and their property practically confiscated. It is just simply for their protection; and I hope that Senators will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada whether he has any objection, inasmuch as it has been asserted both by him and by the Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] that this applies only to claims which have been located in the State of California, to so limit it in the bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, no; I have not said that it applied only to claims in California.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understood the Senator to say there were 400 claims affected by it, and that they were all in the State of California.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know that to be a fact, though I think nearly all of them are; but the bill is limited to claims that were initiated prior to the withdrawals authorized by Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to say, Mr. President, that I am opposed to any leasing system that affects the leasing of lands in my State. I have no objection if the Senator from California wants this to apply to his State; but if it is going to apply to my State, I must say that I should like to examine the bill more closely. We ought to name the States affected and have it apply to those States named. I should have no objection to that; but it does seem to me that if it is known that such claims are limited to certain States, the bill ought to so specify, for I do not want the law to apply in my State.

Mr. PITTMAN. Let me explain it to the Senator. This bill does not provide for the leasing of anything in any State, unless in aid of a compromise of litigation. You can not compel the claimant to accept a lease; the claimant can not compel the Government to give him a lease; it is simply an enabling act to allow the Secretary of the Interior to accept the surrender of a claim to title, and to give a lease if agreeable to both parties. I repeat, it is simply in aid of the settlement of litigation. It does not involve the question of leasing. We have not come down to that at all.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask the Senator whether or not this condition of affairs might not arise? Suppose the Interior Department would say, "Well, we have withdrawn certain lands, and we will not permit you to operate those at all, unless you come in and make some kind of a leasing agreement."

Mr. PITTMAN. That is exactly the condition now.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The question is whether that could apply to those lands that are in dispute now and to lands which the Secretary of the Interior or somebody else might put in dispute in the future.

Mr. PITTMAN. That might all be true. The Government can challenge any title to land initiated under the Government; we can not take that right away from the Government, nor do we desire to do so.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That may be so; but you can readily see that there have been wholesale withdrawals on the part of the Government in regard to coal lands, particularly by putting such an enormous price upon them that nobody will enter them; and if we are to sanction a matter of that kind and give the Secretary the power to lease in the event that a dispute arises, we might as well have a general leasing bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Oh, no; there is nothing to prevent the claimant from going ahead and testing out his claim before the courts.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How many States does the Senator say have claims affected in this way?

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not know. The bill applies wherever we have oil and gas.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In every State?

Mr. PITTMAN. Wherever they have oil and gas.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We have oil and gas in our State to some extent.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not understand that at the present time anybody will be affected by the bill, except operators in California. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing that the effect of the bill shall be confined to my State. I think that will be the effect of it, at all events.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Has anybody appeared before the committee with relation to the matter as to whether any other State than California is affected?

Mr. WORKS. I have never heard that anybody is affected outside of California. No one has made any claim of that kind.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PITTMAN. I think I will yield first to the Senator from Wyoming, if the Senator from California has concluded; if he has not concluded, I will yield to him.

Mr. WORKS. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming, if I am entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I do not suppose the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] or any other Member of this body has been or is more opposed to a general leasing system on the part of the Government than I am. I have contended in season and out of season that the Western States should not become Commonwealths of tenants under the dominion of absent landlords. I have, however, examined this bill very carefully, and, so far as I am concerned, I see nothing whatever objectionable in it. It might, I think, affect some lands in the State of Wyoming; whether as a matter of fact it will I do not know; but I have examined the bill with that possibility in view.

One side of the question is just this: Up to 1910 it was questioned by very many whether the Executive had authority to withdraw lands. I was one of those who insistently claimed that he had not. However, up to that time lands had been withdrawn, and up to that time some of these locations had been made, but titles had not passed. The claims were initiated, and after the first withdrawals, which to many of us seemed entirely unauthorized, in 1910 we passed a law authorizing the President for certain purposes to withdraw lands, which he did. The controversy has come up upon those lands which were withdrawn prior to that time, and this bill is limited to those particular lands.

The question is now pending before the Supreme Court of the United States as to the authority and the validity of the former withdrawals. This bill does not settle or attempt to give legislative sanction or dissent as to the authority of the President, but people had gone on and developed those lands prior to the time of withdrawal. The situation now is that the Government having instituted suits against some of the individual holders or applicants for patents, the right to produce oil by all of them is questioned. The pipe lines will not receive their product, because they say, "If we pay the individual operator for his oil and if the Government shall be successful in its contention, we may be called upon to pay the Government also for the oil which we shall have transported from those particular lines."

This bill gives these individual holders the privilege if they choose to do so—it does not compel them to do so—to stand upon their former rights and litigate the matter out; but if they choose to do so, it allows them to enter into an agreement with the Secretary of the Interior at a maximum compensation by which a permit shall be granted them to operate the land. I can see nothing in this bill that infringes upon my former view or present view as to the general leasing operation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. The case which is now on appeal in the Supreme Court of the United States is upon the holding of a Federal judge in the court below, who has decided in favor of these locators, and decided that the withdrawal upon the part of the Secretary of the Interior of those lands prior to the passage of the act of Congress upon that subject was invalid. Am I correct about that?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The situation of the particular suit which, as I understand, will test this whole question of the validity of the withdrawals was that the district court of the United States held against the contention of the Government; in other words, held that the withdrawals prior to authority being given to Congress were invalid. That suit went to the court of appeals, which certified it to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As soon as I have finished the sentence I will be glad to yield. A hearing was had, and thereafter a rehearing was ordered, which was held, I think, the last time the court met to hear arguments; so that it is still an open question.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, is the Senator satisfied that the bill will not be a detriment to any of the locators in his State?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I am satisfied of that; yes.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no objection to the bill.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to inquire of the Senator if the character of the claims under which this compromise is sought to be made is at all defined in this bill?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not know that they are defined in this bill, but the character of the oil-land claims is well defined by the statute.

Mr. PITTMAN. I do not think the Senator from Wyoming understands. I think the Senator from Alabama wants to know whether or not the claims of the claimants against the Government which are to be compromised are set out in the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Whether they are defined.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say that they are not set out in the bill because the claim of an oil claimant is always based upon a statutory location.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. PITTMAN. And the Government is challenging the validity of those locations.

Mr. WHITE. The condition is defined, then?

Mr. PITTMAN. The condition is sufficiently defined.

Mr. WHITE. I should like to inquire of the Senator if this applies to mineral lands other than oil lands?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Not at all.

Mr. PITTMAN. It does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. May I ask, before this matter proceeds, is the proposed substitute reported unanimously from the Public Lands Committee?

Mr. PITTMAN. It is.

Mr. BORAH. It is general in its application and does not apply alone to California?

Mr. PITTMAN. It does not.

Mr. BORAH. Is the Senator from Nevada anxious to have this bill disposed of this morning?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am very anxious, and I will say that the Department of the Interior is also very anxious to have it disposed of. There is a great loss to the Government and to the independent operators right now. Every day the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. and the Standard Oil Co. are taking oil out of this very ground that is in dispute, and the Government wants to compromise and the independent operators want to compromise the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I certainly do not want to stand in the way of legislation which is important and for which an emergency seems to demand immediate consideration; but I do not want, by permitting this bill to pass without objection, to have it understood that I am consenting to a general leasing system with reference to public lands. That is a matter requiring a great deal of careful consideration before any policy which shall become permanent is agreed upon.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Idaho that this is a matter of the greatest emergency, and it affects interests in my own State. There is nothing in this bill that commits the Government to a leasing system; and it will not be injurious in any way. It is simply for the protection of some of the smaller oil operators in my State, whose property is about to be destroyed by the big operators on account of litigation that has taken place there that binds the hands of these people so that they are not able to dispose of their oil. Not only that, but while their hands are tied in that way, the Southern Pacific Railroad Co. can dispose of its oil; it is putting down wells near the lands of these operators, and it is absolutely taking the oil away from them. The bill is simply for their relief, and it can not result in any such misfortune as the Senator from Idaho apprehends. If I thought it committed the Government to a general leasing system, I should feel like the Senator from Idaho, because I am not committed to the leasing of oil or any other lands, and I want to assure the Senator that the bill has no such effect.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the statement of the Senator from Nevada and that of the Senator from California, who know most about this matter, I shall not interpose any further objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee in the nature of a substitute.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits to the occupants of certain unpatented lands on which oil or gas has been discovered, and authorizing the extraction of oil or gas therefrom."

KING THEOLOGICAL HALL.

Mr. HOLLIS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the bill (S. 5168) for the relief of the King Theological Hall, and authorizing the conveyance of real estate to the Howard University, and I submit a report (No. 569) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if the bill comes from the committee with a unanimous report?

Mr. HOLLIS. It does. This is a purely private bill. The King Theological Hall is a charitable organization composed of certain Episcopalian clergymen; and this bill is designed to remedy certain technical defects in the organization and give them the power to convey real estate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the following persons be, and they and their successors, as trustees, are declared to be, the corporation of the King Theological Hall, established by act of Congress approved January 7, 1891, and the legal trustees thereof, namely: Alfred Harding, Randolph H. McKim, Richard P. Williams, George Williamson Smith, and William C. Rives. In such capacity said trustees, or their successors, are hereby authorized to convey all or any part of the real estate of said corporation, whether now owned or hereafter acquired.

Said trustees at any regular meeting may authorize any two of their number to execute a good and sufficient deed of conveyance of such real estate.

The trustees above named, or their successors, may, if they shall deem it necessary, increase their number from time to time and determine by by-law the number required to constitute a quorum: Provided, That the whole number of trustees shall not exceed 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of the King Theological Hall, and authorizing the conveyance of real estate to the Howard University and other grantees."

MANDAN (N. DAK.) TOWN AND COUNTRY CLUB.

Mr. WORKS. On behalf of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands [Mr. MYERS], I report back favorably from that committee, without amendment, the bill (S. 5254) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to sell and convey a certain tract of land to the Mandan Town and Country Club, and I submit a report (No. 570) thereon.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the bill first be read, Mr. President.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey to the Mandan Town and Country Club, of Mandan, N. Dak., at a price of not less than $30 per acre, the below-described land: In section 33, in township 139 north of range 81 west of the fifth principal meridian, beginning at a point 1,120 feet due east from the northwest corner of the southeast quarter of said section 33, thence running due south 400 feet, thence running due east 300 feet, thence running due north 400 feet, thence running due west 300 feet to the starting point, containing 2¾ acres, more or less: Provided, That if the said Mandan Town and Country club should at any time attempt to use said tract of land for any other purpose than that of recreation or attempt to sell, lease, or convey said tract, the land shall revert to the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NEW YORK CENTRAL & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 382), submitted by Mr. NORRIS on the 28th instant, was read, as follows:

Whereas the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co., through its ownership of the stock of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., forms a continuous line of railway from Chicago, through Buffalo, to New York City; and

Whereas said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls by lease the West Shore Railroad Co.; and the said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. owns the stock of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. (Nickel Plate), which, together with the said West Shore Railroad Co., constitutes a railroad running parallel to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. and the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. from Chicago, through Buffalo, to New York City; and

Whereas said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. owns the stock in the Western Transit Co. and the Rutland Transit Co., constituting a water-navigation line engaged in interstate commerce between Buffalo and Chicago and intermediate points; and

Whereas this ownership results in a combination under one control of four competing lines of transportation between Chicago and Buffalo and two competing lines between Buffalo and New York City; and

Whereas the said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., in addition to the ownership of the said New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., owns all of the stock of the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Co.; of the Chicago, Indiana & Southern Railroad Co.; and of the Jamestown, Franklin & Clearfield Railroad Co.; and also owns more than 50 per cent of the stock of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co.; and

Whereas the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls the Western Maryland Railway Co., which, together with the said Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co., constitutes another competing line between territory covered by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. and the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. with the Atlantic seaboard; and

Whereas the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. is now taking the necessary steps to more completely consolidate all of the aforesaid railroads, together with others, under one ownership and control: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the various combinations of railroads above set forth are in violation of the Sherman antitrust law or any other statute of the United States, and whether the Department of Justice has in contemplation any action for the dissolution of said combination.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce in order that it may be considered and reported back at an early day. I think the committee can report it back very shortly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, this resolution, like all similar resolutions that are passed, simply calls upon the Attorney General for information. I think the facts set out in the whereases of the resolution are matters of common knowledge. For instance, it is well known that the Lake Shore road, the Michigan Central road, and the Nickel Plate road form three parallel lines of railway running from Chicago to Buffalo. Two of those roads for a great distance are in plain sight of each other, running to all the principal cities between those two terminals, and between the Lake Shore and the Michigan Central there are two boat lines operating between Buffalo and Chicago and all the intermediate lake cities. From Buffalo east there are the New York Central and the West Shore roads, running parallel clear across the State of New York to Albany within plain sight of each other, running into nearly all the cities in that State, and then from Albany south, running on opposite sides of the Hudson River to the city of New York.

The question asked of the Attorney General is whether the ownership of these railroads under one head—the New York Central Railway—constitutes a violation of the Sherman antitrust act. That is the substance of the resolution. There is another combination of railroads named in the resolution that is also owned by the New York Central, namely, the Western Maryland and the Pittsburgh & Erie, I think. While those roads are not close to the others, they form a railroad line from the same territory covered by these other roads to the seaboard, which they reach at Baltimore.

The only thing the resolution asks is whether these railroads, having been combined under one ownership, violate the Sherman antitrust law.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. NORRIS. Just a moment, please. Let me say that not very long ago the Supreme Court had before it the question of the combination of the Central Pacific, running from Ogden, Utah, to the Pacific coast, and the Southern Pacific, a thousand miles farther south, but with the same terminal. The court held that the combination of those two roads was contrary to the Sherman Antitrust Act.

It seems to me that no good can come from referring a simple proposition of this kind to a committee. There is no action proposed, so far as the resolution is concerned, except to ask the Attorney General whether that combination is in violation of law. I think the fact that the combination exists is admitted practically by all those who are familiar in a general way with the statements that have appeared from time to time.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I have promised to yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. Afterwards I will yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, many of the purchases referred to in the resolution were made some 20 years ago. There may be a question about the policy of dissolving corporations in such cases which will come up at the proper time, if the resolution passes, after the Attorney General reports.

I am not going to object to the adoption of the resolution, but I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in casually looking up the matter for a minute or two I noticed that the West Shore Railroad was leased to the New York Central January 1, 1886, which was before the passage of the Sherman Act; and I presume the Senator will want to have eliminated any question that relates to a lease made before the passage of the present law.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad, commonly known as the Nickel Plate, was also purchased by the Lake Shore Road prior to the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act. Personally I do not think that makes any difference. The fact that the combination was formed before the enactment of the Sherman law will be no defense. Whether it does or not, however, if there is any dispute about it, we ought to get the opinion of the highest legal authority that we have in the Government, so that if that is a defense, if that does not constitute a combination in violation of law, the Attorney General probably will tell us so. There are various other combinations that have existed, all connected with this subject matter, and which are set out in the various whereases of the resolution, where the combination was formed since the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and I think one of them only within the last year or so.

Mr. WEEKS. Of course, if the lease had been made before the passage of the law it would not be affected by the law, and we might be asking the Attorney General a very foolish question. My only point was that if there were other such cases in this resolution they ought to be eliminated before it is agreed to.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will first yield to the Senator from Indiana and then to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska did not mention what seems to me to be the objectionable feature of this resolution, namely, the last clause, in which we call upon the Department of Justice to know its intentions as to bringing an action for the dissolution of the combination. I objected to that kind of a resolution some time ago. I do not think it is proper for Congress to call on the Attorney General to disclose in advance what he proposes to do with reference to suits in the enforcement of the Sherman antitrust law.

I am in entire sympathy with the resolution, except that part. I can remember when the Michigan Southern and the Michigan Central were actively competing lines. The competition was a very wholesome one. I then remember when the so-called Nickel Plate road was built by Mr. Brice and some others from Chicago to Buffalo. It was intended to be a very actively competing line; that is to say, it was presumedly to be an actively competing line, and the presumption was so strong that these other interests bought it out at a very large figure, to the very great profit of Mr. Brice and his associates. I have often wondered why it was that these three great trunk lines, natural competitors for business, were permitted to be consolidated in one great corporation.

If the last clause was stricken out—that clause which calls on the Attorney General to show his hand, to advertise to the country what he intends to do with reference to bringing a lawsuit—I would be very heartily in favor of the resolution without a reference, because there is nothing obscure about the resolution. It simply calls for information as to facts that are well known to some of us and which ought to be well known to all.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me first reply briefly to the Senator from Indiana. Personally I do not see any objection to the clause the Senator from Indiana objects to. I do not think it is very material to the resolution, I will say, and I would not have any objection to striking it out. I remember that the Senate, in the last Congress—in the last session, I think, of the last administration—passed a joint resolution instructing the Attorney General—even they went further than asking him, but passed a joint resolution instructing him—to take an appeal in a certain case or to take some other action. I know I was on the Judiciary Committee of the House and I tried my best to get a favorable report out of that committee and have the House pass it. However, it died; we did not reach it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me just a word?

Mr. NORRIS. I wanted to yield to the Senator from Wyoming, but I will yield to the Senator from New Hampshire first.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on a previous occasion when a similar resolution was before the Senate I took occasion to criticize language which was identical with the language employed in this resolution, to which the Senator from Indiana calls attention. I used, perhaps, too strong a word on that occasion when I said I thought it was impertinence to ask the official of the Government to disclose what the Government contemplated doing in any case of this kind. I will not use that word to-day, but I will appeal to the Senator to strike out that language, because I feel sure that it will not weaken the resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think it will weaken it myself. Now I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The question that I wanted to ask the Senator does not have reference to the last paragraph. The fact of the matter is I am not sure but that the last paragraph is better than the first. The first paragraph calls upon the Attorney General for a legal opinion upon a statement of facts set forth in the preamble. I wanted to ask the Senator what he thinks of the propriety of calling upon the Attorney General for a legal opinion? There is no question, of course, of our right and our duty, if he has the facts, to call upon him for the facts which he may have discovered or which can be discovered, but of course his legal opinion would not be binding upon Congress, neither would his legal opinion transmitted to Congress be binding upon any person. I wanted to suggest to the Senator whether he thinks it is really good form for the Congress of the United States or the Senate of the United States upon a known statement of facts to ask the Attorney General for his legal opinion in this manner by a public resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. I believe it is more respectful to the Attorney General to ask his opinion than it would be to get the opinion, for instance, of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, and then on the strength of that opinion instruct the Attorney General by a joint resolution what he should do. My idea is that there is not anything improper in asking the Attorney General for his opinion. I do not myself think there is anything improper in the last clause. It does not seem to me to be at all objectionable. I do not want anything in the resolution that is objectionable, and I am not undertaking to get anything in it that is so.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator does not understand me. I am not particularly objecting to the last paragraph; but suppose the Attorney General should give his legal opinion to the Senate upon this statement of facts, and suppose his opinion should be that it did form a combination in restraint of trade or against the Sherman Antitrust Act; what then?

Mr. NORRIS. My judgment is—and that is the real object of the resolution—that these various combinations that are set forth in the whereases to the resolution are illegal, contrary to the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that they ought to be dissolved by the Government. If the Attorney General rendered an opinion that they or any one or more of them were unlawful, he would undoubtedly follow it with proper action. I want to call the attention of the Attorney General in an official way to what I believe to be a violation of the law. If there is no violation of the law there, the Attorney General will be able to say so. It will be easy for him to ascertain what these combinations are; and if they are illegal and there is nothing that can be done, perhaps it would be useful to have that information in framing legislation that the Senate or the Congress might desire to enact for the purpose of avoiding the contingency that exists now because of these various combinations.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Of course, neither the Senator from Nebraska, who himself has been an eminent lawyer and upon the bench, nor the Senate itself would care to be bound by any opinion the Attorney General might render upon a known state of fact. In other words, neither the Senator nor the Senate would care to submit to the Attorney General of the United States the decision of the question whether a pending state of fact constituted violations of the law or not. That is the point I wanted to get at.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Before I yield to the Senator from North Carolina let me say a word in answer to the Senator from Wyoming about the legal phase of it. Some time ago I introduced a resolution calling on the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation in regard to certain securities that the New York Central proposed to issue to be used in the acquisition of some of the combinations that are set out in the whereases to this resolution. The Senate passed that resolution. The Interstate Commerce Commission made an investigation and found that the bonds that I had called attention to in the resolution were legal and proper. There were other questions in the resolution. One of them asked the commission to specifically find whether the bonds, some 4 per cent bonds instead of 3½ per cent bonds, that seemed to me were a great loss to the stockholders of the company, were proper to be issued to carry out this consolidation, and then if the combination was in violation of the law.

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in reporting upon their action to the Senate, saying that they believed it was proper under all the circumstances for them to issue the 4 per cent bonds and take up the 3½ per cent bonds, took up the other question, which was really a legal question, the question that is in reality involved here in this resolution, although there are more combinations set out here than there were in the other resolution, and they said:

We think this question is one more properly to be passed upon by the Department of Justice, and as to it we therefore express no opinion.

They did not answer that question.

Now, I want to be perfectly frank with the Senate, and I say frankly that the real object of this resolution is to get action by the Department of Justice for the dissolution of these combinations or a sufficient reason why such action should not be begun. There may be such a reason. I do not know of any, and I can not conceive of any, but there may be one, there may be several. It is certainly perfectly proper if we believe, as I think we all do, that these various combinations do exist, and that it does block competition as far as these roads are concerned.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] spoke of the lively competition that existed before the Michigan Central was taken over. I lived in Ohio when the Nickel Plate Railroad was built. I remember the first railroad survey ran between the house and barn of the farm on which I lived. Later it was built about a mile on one side. I am familiar with that country. All those towns through there are touched by those two roads. It runs through some of the best country in the world, and the Nickel Plate ought to be a lively competing line to the Lake Shore road; but it was bought by the Lake Shore, and then what followed? I do not believe the Nickel Plate ever built a branch line; they never took the initiative; they did not do anything in developing the country, because it was to the interest of the railroad that owned it that it should not do so. They wanted to kill competition, and they did kill competition; and now, as one of the whereases says, the New York Central is contemplating the perfection of some of these various plans and trying to take over various railroads in the State of Ohio, some of which are not mentioned in the resolution, and some of which I believe could properly be mentioned. I did not know enough about the facts, so I did not want to put them in. It means the breaking down of competition between the coal fields of West Virginia and Pennsylvania and the Lake country. They are now in litigation in the State of Ohio. The officials of the State of Ohio have now under consideration the question as to whether some of these things shall be permitted or not; and it seems to me that the Federal Government ought to take a stand here and say that these things are right or say that they are wrong, and then undertake to make them right.

Now I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I did not exactly understand what the Senator from Nebraska proposes by this resolution. It says:

That the Attorney General be, and is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the various combinations of railroads above set forth are in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] said, suppose the Attorney General says it is, or suppose he says it is not, what difference does it make to the Senate? I presume the Attorney General is doing his duty, and that if it is a violation of the antitrust law he is bringing a suit for that purpose. He ought to do it, and it is his duty to do it; and I presume he is going about that very thing to-day. Now, why should we have his opinion on this subject? What is the purpose of it? Is it a reflection on the Attorney General? What is the purpose of getting this information?

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator through with his questions?

Mr. OVERMAN. I am asking the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer categorically the last question of the Senator. It is not a reflection on the Attorney General. It seems that no resolution can be introduced here calling on the Attorney General for information unless some Senator construes it to be a reflection upon him. I have some correspondence here with the Department of Justice——

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator has not answered my first question. What is the preference of getting this information?

Mr. NORRIS. I think if the Attorney General says it is an illegal combination the next step will be to begin action to have the combination dissolved. Is there any objection to calling his attention to the fact?

Mr. OVERMAN. If it is illegal?

Mr. NORRIS. What is the objection to calling special attention to the fact? It is not giving him specific instructions, but permits him to rely upon his own judgment and upon his own investigation, and the result of that investigation he would have to make public.

Mr. OVERMAN. If that is so, does not the Senator suppose that the Attorney General is going ahead and prosecuting the case?

Mr. NORRIS. I should think he would.

Mr. OVERMAN. Of course he would. Then what is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. It is calling his attention to it. He has not done so yet. I am going to read some correspondence——

Mr. OVERMAN. The very fact that the Senator has introduced the resolution calls attention to it.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senate does not want to interfere in the matter, it can vote down the resolution, and let it do so.

Mr. OVERMAN. Not at all. That is not my purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. That is just what the effect would be.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not see what the opinion of the Attorney General on this matter has to do with the action of the Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Is not the situation really this, eliminating the formality of expression, that the Senator from Nebraska thinks there is a combination in violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and he thinks the Attorney General is not prosecuting it, but he wants to insist that he shall do so?

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask the Senator if that is his purpose, to say that he has failed in his duty?

Mr. NORRIS. I would not say he was not doing his duty. I do not want to go that far. I want the Attorney General either to prosecute or to state what he thinks are the facts and why he does not.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have confidence enough in the Attorney General to say that if he believes they are doing it in violation of law—and I believe it is in violation of the law—I think he will do it, but I do not see why the Senate should pass a resolution simply calling for his opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will further answer the suggestion of the Senator. I am going to read some correspondence.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator any reason to believe that the Attorney General has had his attention called to this combination?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I have. I was about to read some correspondence to show it.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator any reason to believe that the Attorney General is not willing to go on and perform his duty, and, if there is a combination, to prosecute it?

Mr. NORRIS. I did not hear the last part of the Senator's question.

Mr. REED. Has the Senator any reason to believe that the Attorney General, having had his attention already directed to this combination, will not go on and perform his full duty with reference to a prosecution?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure that the Attorney General believes that there is a violation of the law. It may be that the Attorney General knows more about it than we do. It may be that the Attorney General does not believe there is a violation of the law.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. NORRIS. If that be true, he can give a reason for the faith in him, and he will tell us so.

Mr. REED. That hardly answers my question, because if the Attorney General has had his attention directed to this matter, and no one is prepared to charge that he is not willing to perform his duty, it follows that he is now in the discharge of his duty, proceeding as he ought to proceed to investigate and to determine the facts and take such action as the law warrants. If that is the case, then the sole effect of this resolution would be to demand that the Attorney General shall do that which he is already doing.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see how the Senator from Nebraska could have framed his resolution in more courteous and polite language for the purpose of simply calling this matter to the attention of the Attorney General. It says:

That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the various combinations of railroads above set forth are in violation of the Sherman antitrust law or any other statute of the United States, and whether the Department of Justice has in contemplation any action for the dissolution of said combination.

If the Senator from Nebraska simply desired to call the attention of the Attorney General to this condition of affairs, assuming possibly that it had not been called to his attention, he seems to have used quite inoffensive language.

Mr. REED. But how can he assume possibly that they have not been called to his attention when the Senator has already stated he knows they have been called to his attention?

Mr. BORAH. The presumption would be that if there had been a violation of the Sherman antitrust law the Attorney General would have proceeded to prosecute these parties. Now, the Senator from Nebraska asks him as to whether or not there is a violation. If the Attorney General gives reasons why he believes that there is no violation of the Sherman antitrust law, it relieves him from the implication of failing to do his duty.

Mr. REED. But it is a question now of notice we are discussing. No one has yet impugned the motives of the Attorney General.

Mr. BORAH. No; it is only asking for his contemplated action.

Mr. REED. That is a separate question which I shall be glad to discuss. This whole question now avowed by the Senator is notice. That notice, the Senator states, he has already given, and if the notice has already been given it is not necessary to give it again.

The question of asking the Attorney General to state in advance what he contemplates doing with reference to the prosecution of a company which is alleged now or assumed for the time being at least to be engaged in criminal practices is quite a different question, and it involves the propriety of the Senate insisting that the Attorney General shall advise the criminal in advance as to just what he contemplates—a very bad practice, and a practice which might be resorted to by the friends of combinations in order that the Department of Justice should be forced to advise the criminal in advance of the action contemplated, and thus balk the ends of justice.

Let me be plain. I attribute no such motive as that to the Senator from Nebraska. I know he has no such motive. I would not think of intimating that; but if the practice were indulged in it could easily be employed for that purpose.

Mr. BORAH. But suppose that the Attorney General should advise the country that he contemplated bringing a suit against these railroad companies, and the railroad companies, out of dire fear of the contemplation of that suit, should dissolve themselves and reorganize themselves into competitive bodies, no particular harm could be done the public.

Mr. REED. Ah, but that is not the point I am addressing myself to. Suppose the Attorney General were in the pursuit of certain information necessary to make a case and was about to get it, and suppose that the railroads were advised in advance that he was seeking that information, it might be very easy to spirit away the evidence and get a witness out of the country to balk the ends of justice. The Senator from Idaho has practiced law too long not to understand the very great advantage frequently flowing to a defendant to be advised in advance that the State is making an investigation and contemplates a prosecution.

Mr. BORAH. That is true with reference to a particular class of violators of the law, but it is not true with reference to railroads, to any considerable extent, because the physical facts are there; they are the competing lines, running side by side, and ownership is well and easily established. Of course, if the Attorney General is after some secret information, he would undoubtedly advise us to that effect, and we would doubtless allow him to contemplate awhile longer or to postpone matters until he was well prepared.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Idaho evidently overlooks the little circumstance that recently transpired, where the books of a railroad company were burned—at least it was so charged in the public press. He overlooks the fact that witnesses in these trust cases have found it convenient to emigrate to Europe. He overlooks the fact that in various trust prosecutions—at least in those brought by States, one of them, notably, by my own State—it was found necessary, in order to get subpœnas upon witnesses who had been advised in advance and ran away, to delay proceedings for months. I say that if we are to assume two facts—first, that the Attorney General has been notified, and, second, that he is an honest man—then the purpose in passing this resolution is nil, unless it be to intimate that he is not an honest official.

I want to ask the Senator from Nebraska if it is not true now that the Attorney General has already complained, and complained bitterly, because contemplated prosecutions have been interfered with and immunity granted to witnesses, which, he alleges, may seriously interfere with criminal prosecutions?

Mr. NORRIS. No; that is not true.

Mr. REED. And if one of those resolutions was not introduced by the Senator himself?

Mr. NORRIS. That is not true. The Senator from Missouri is referring to the resolution in regard to the New Haven Railroad. The Attorney General did not have in contemplation any criminal action, and nobody has been given immunity in that case. The Attorney General has never said, excepting as the statements have appeared in the newspapers——

Mr. REED. Did he not write a letter in which he said——

Mr. NORRIS. Not only that, but, if the Senator wants to go into that proposition, I have a statement from the Attorney General's office now in my desk to the effect that there never was in contemplation any criminal action; that there was no violation of any Federal statute in all the proceedings that were had in the New Haven affair.

Mr. REED. Is it not——

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want to discuss that now, unless it is desired to go into it, because that has not anything to do with this question.

Mr. REED. I want to ask merely one question with reference to the matter. Is it not a fact that the Attorney General wrote a letter in which he warned the Interstate Commerce Commission or its attorney or the Senator from Nebraska that the proceedings about to be taken where these witnesses were to be put upon the stand might result in immunity and in barring prosecution by the Government? Is not that true?

Mr. NORRIS. The Attorney General wrote some letter; he published a letter.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. It had something to that effect in it.

Mr. REED. I want, with the courtesy of the Senator from Nebraska, to add this, and then I will take my seat: In what I have said I do not want to be misunderstood. I am not criticizing the Interstate Commerce Commission nor its attorney; I am simply taking this position with reference to the matter now under consideration, that if the Attorney General has been notified, if the Senator believes he is not performing his duty; and the Senator as a lawyer and as a former judge having examined into these matters believes there is a combination, the proper way to present the question would be by a square resolution reciting the facts of the combination and calling upon the Attorney General to begin a proper prosecution; but if it is merely a question of notifying the Attorney General, then the fact that the notice has already been given is a complete answer to the proffer of this resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator that he ask a question now. He has asked one three or four times, and I am ready to answer it whenever he gets through, but he keeps repeating it.

Mr. REED. I will be through in a moment. That being the case, it would seem to me that the sole purpose of this resolution is by indirection to reflect upon the Attorney General, because the resolution recites as facts things which, if they be true, constitute all that is necessary to make a combination in violation of the antitrust act. Having recited that, the resolution proceeds then to ask the Attorney General what his opinion is, and then whether he intends to prosecute them.

It seems to me that it would be a much fairer way for the Senator to recite his facts, as he has, and to denounce these people as a trust, and put it up to the Senate whether they want to command the Attorney General to proceed. Then the question would remain to be settled whether it is necessary to put that sort of humiliation upon the Attorney General.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question involved in the other proposition. I am ready to discuss it if it comes properly before the Senate. I refer to the New Haven matter; but it is not involved in this resolution. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] very adroitly works it in in the way of a criticism upon this resolution and upon my action in the matter, but I am going to pass it because it is not involved here. I am only going to say that, in my judgment, immunity has been given to nobody. The Attorney General did not contemplate any prosecution against anybody who has testified or who is going to testify; at least, in a conference called for the purpose of ascertaining whether it would be proper for that investigation to proceed, at which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] was present, there was no claim made by the Attorney General that he had any sufficient evidence on which to prosecute anyone, or that he contemplated any such prosecution.

Now, as to the question which the Senator has submitted—and he has repeated it five times at least, always in different form and always clothed in beautiful language—that if the Attorney General has once had notice, is not this resolution, in fact, only another notice and therefore in reality insulting to the Attorney General? I am not to blame if somebody puts a construction on my action that I do not believe is warranted, and that I had no intention of having anyone put upon it, and insists always when a question is asked here of the Attorney General that a reflection is really being cast upon him.

The Senator from Missouri says I ought to set forth these facts in a resolution, as I have, and then demand that the Attorney General take action. Had I taken that course, there is no doubt that I would have been assailed here in the Senate as doing an injustice to the Attorney General and as in reality insulting him; as claiming that he was not doing his duty. Setting forth a state of facts which the Senator from Missouri says constitute a violation of the Sherman antitrust act and then demanding that the Attorney General institute a prosecution, it seems to me might possibly be construed as a reflection, if we assume that the facts were all set forth.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me finish first, and I will yield to the Senator later.

I have said the Attorney General has had notice of this proposition. In a general way the whole country has had notice. Everybody knows, I take it, of the existence of this great combination, at least in some of its details. This matter was brought to the attention of the Department of Justice in the preceding administration; and here is a letter from the Department of Justice, dated May 21, 1909, in which it is stated:

The department is in receipt of your letter of the 20th instant, in regard to your complaint that the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. is violating the Sherman law by reason of the fact that it controls a large majority stock interest in three parallel and competing railroads operating between Buffalo, N. Y., and Chicago, Ill., to wit, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., the New York, Chicago, & St. Louis Railway Co., and the Michigan Central Railroad Co.

In view of the fact that the case of the United States v. Union Pacific Railroad Co. et al.—

That is the case I mentioned a while ago—

now pending in the courts, will determine whether or not it is a violation of the Sherman law for one railroad to own a majority stock interest in several competing railroads, the department has decided that no action be taken in the premises at the present time.

That was signed by Wade H. Ellis, Acting Attorney General.

Mr. REED. Who was the Attorney General at that time?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Wickersham. As I said before, this matter was called to the attention of the Department of Justice during the preceding administration. The Senator will not be able, with all his ingenuity, to make out of this that I am undertaking to ask any information of the present Attorney General on account of partisan reasons.

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President, the sole purpose of my question—I was reading a document at the time—was to learn who was the Attorney General. I was casting no insinuations or reflections.

Mr. NORRIS. On the 15th day of May, 1913, under the present administration, a letter was directed to Mr. McReynolds, the Attorney General, and his attention at considerable length was called to this particular matter and to the letters on file since May, 1909. The letter from the Department of Justice is not the only one I have here. There was at least one other letter, as well as other correspondence, as to whether or not this was a violation of the law, and so forth, and some quotations from the Supreme Court, set forth in a letter——

Mr. OVERMAN. Is that a letter to the present Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a letter to the present Attorney General; yes.

Mr. OVERMAN. Who addressed that letter to the Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. This was directed to the Attorney General by C. H. Venner & Co.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know whether or not they have had a reply?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I am going to read it. I am going to explain this notice which the Senator from Missouri has been talking about. Venner & Co. call attention to all the other letters that are on file in this same matter. On the 24th day of May, 1913, Venner & Co. received an answer from the Attorney General. That was under the present administration of Mr. McReynolds, and this is the letter:

GENTLEMEN: This department is in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, in which you allege that the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls three parallel and formerly competing lines between the cities of Chicago and Buffalo, and urging the institution of dissolution proceedings under the Sherman Act.

You are informed that the entire subject of railroad combinations is now under consideration by the department, and your action in bringing this instance to its attention is very much appreciated.

Respectfully,

(Signed) J. A. FOWLER,
Assistant to the Attorney General.
(For the Attorney General.)

That was more than a year ago. Can any Senator say that the resolution I have introduced is a reflection on anybody after the prior notice, as the Senator calls it, has remained for more than a year without any action being taken? There may be sufficient reason why no action has been taken; and I repeat that the object of this resolution is to find out that reason. If the resolution is not courteous, if the language is in any way discourteous or reflecting, it ought to be changed, and I would not have any objection to any change that would make it courteous.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say, if the Senator will permit me just a moment, that I have no intention of casting a reflection on anybody, and it seems to me that this resolution does not do so; but, Mr. President, if men will insist on being insulted when one is trying to act politely toward them, I am not to blame for it; I have no such intention.

As I have said, the matter was taken up with the former Attorney General, and he gave a reason why he did not proceed. I thought myself that the reason he gave in a general way was good, but even if the opinion of the Supreme Court held that the Union Pacific case, involving also the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific, held that that combination was not illegal, I did not think it would be a fair precedent in this case, because that combination was formed by railroads which I had a good deal of doubt about as to whether they operated in competitive territory, but in this case I do not believe there could be any such doubt. The Supreme Court, however, held that in the Central and Southern Railroad case the combination was contrary to law, and then it seemed to me that it was proper to take steps looking to the dissolution of the combination of the roads mentioned in the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield first to the Senator from Missouri, and then I will yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. REED. The Senator has just read a letter from the Attorney General written more than a year ago. At that time the method pursued in communicating was by writing to him. Has the Senator in the intervening year written to the Attorney General?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not.

Mr. REED. Or in any way asked him whether he has arrived at any conclusion?

Mr. NORRIS. I have not, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that that would have been quite the proper thing to do?

Mr. NORRIS. It would have been perfectly proper, I will say, and perhaps I am subject to criticism, because I did not do it, but I did not. I am not going to try to cover up any of the facts.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think now that the Attorney General would deal with him in entire frankness, if he asked him?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably. I have not denied that; I have not asserted anything here from which such a conclusion could be drawn. On the other hand, has not the Senate a right, if it wants to do so, to ask this question? Is it any more discourteous for the Senate to ask it than for an individual to do so?

It appeared to me, when that letter was written, that the Attorney General had a scheme on hand by which he was going to take hold of this great question in a broad way. I have had that letter in my possession ever since about the time it was written. I refused to introduce any resolution then, because it seemed to me that that answer was sufficient at least for a delay, and that if the Attorney General had that in contemplation he ought to be given an opportunity, without anybody interfering with it, to carry out the plan that he had. Having waited more than a year, however, and nothing having developed, it seemed to me that it was perfectly proper to introduce this resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. The only question with the Senator, then, is the time. He has the information from his own letter that the Attorney General is considering or investigating the matter; and because he has not brought the suit within 12 months the Senator does not ask for the opinion of the Attorney General, but he asks that which only a court can decide, and that is whether or not this combination is in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. NORRIS. The court will never decide it if the Government does not begin an action.

Mr. OVERMAN. But can the Attorney General say whether or not it is so? He can only give an opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all he is asked to give.

Mr. OVERMAN. He is asked whether the combination is in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act.

Mr. NORRIS. That will be his opinion, I take it.

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator knows now that he is considering the matter, and if he finds that it is in violation of the antitrust law he is going to bring a suit.

Mr. NORRIS. How long should we wait? Suppose we wait four years, and this Attorney General goes out and another one comes in, and then he says, "Well, I am considering it," shall we wait four years more?

Some of the men under the Attorney General who had been in the other cases, or were investigating all cases of this kind, were under the former Attorney General and are still under this one. They know all about the situation in a general way. The department knows about it. It seems to me that after we have waited a year it is proper for us to say, "What have you done? What are you going to do, if anything? Is there anything there that ought to bring about action on the part of the Government?"

Mr. OVERMAN. Does the Senator know that the Attorney General has not been investigating this matter?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I assume that he has been investigating it and that he is ready to give his opinion on it. He has had over a year's time in which to do it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think that the resolution had better go to a committee, and let the committee inquire what is being done?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so. That is for the Senate to say, of course. If the Senate wants to do that, it will have a chance.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does not the Senator think that would be the better course?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I do not think so.

Mr. OVERMAN. To have the resolution go to the committee, and let the committee communicate with the Attorney General and see what has been done, and whether or not it is proper to pass the resolution?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so.

Mr. OVERMAN. I do not want to block the matter at all. As to the merits of the matter, I know not. If the facts stated in the preamble are true, of course the Attorney General, I take it for granted, will bring the suit, and is preparing to do it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think I ought to say a word on that subject of the preamble.

The Senator from Missouri referred to the statements in the preamble. I think they are true.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not suppose I have the same opportunity to investigate that the Attorney General has. I may be mistaken about it. I have no doubt about the truth of every one of the statements. I would not have put them in the resolution if I had not believed them; but I could not go on the witness stand and testfy under oath as to their truth. They may not be true. Some of them may be true and some of them not true. If they are not true, the Attorney General will be able to tell us that they are not true.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield now to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has in part answered the question which I intended to ask when I first rose. Each of these preambles has a recital of one or more facts.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. They are specific statements. If this resolution is passed, the Senate will be committing itself to a belief in the correctness of each one of these statements.

If the Senator has personal knowledge of these facts, that is one thing. If he is reciting these matters simply upon information and belief, that is another.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me give the Senator some information.

Mr. POMERENE. I was going to ask the Senator, in the instances in which he has not specific personal knowledge, if he will not give us the information upon which he bases these statements.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I shall be glad to do so. Some of them I gathered from Poor's Manual. Some of them I gathered from the statement of the facts by the Interstate Commerce Commission in reporting on the resolution that I referred to in the beginning of my remarks. I gathered some of them from other similar sources.

Let me read a little here from the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission. I take it that is pretty good authority. I take it that they know. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not believe there is any question about the facts, but his question is a very proper one.

Here is a statement that includes some of the whereases, but not all of them:

> The Lake Shore owns all of the stock of the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Co.; of the Chicago, Indiana & Southern Railway Co.; and of the Jamestown, Franklin & Clearfield Railroad Co., and a trifle more than 50 per cent of the stock of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co. and of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co.

That is the Nickel Plate; and so on. The document from which I have been reading is the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission, No. 5960, in the matter of the proposed bond issue by the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co.

I will say to the Senator that I have assumed that if I got a statement of that kind from the Interstate Commerce Commission, or if I should see it in Poor's Manual or other similar sources, the fact was true.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course nobody charges the Senator with bad faith. Of course he must believe these things or he would not have recited them in the resolution. The Senator, however, has told us in express terms that he does not know these things to be true. Now, I ask him if he thinks he ought to ask the Senate to pass a resolution solemnly reciting a long list of matters as of fact when he admits that he does not know whether they are facts or not?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Ought not the resolution——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me answer that question before the Senator asks another one.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will let me finish my question, ought not his resolution to be framed——

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the Senator is putting another question.

Mr. REED. Ought not the resolution to be framed so that it would read, "Whereas it is reported," and so on?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to amending it in that way.

Mr. REED. Very well. That is a different thing.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection whatever to that. I take it that if the committee had this question under investigation and nobody denied, to begin with, a certain fact, and you took it from the opinion of the Interstate Commerce Commission in regard to the ownership of a railroad, you would not investigate any further unless somebody denied it. If somebody came in and said, "I deny this proposition"; if the Lake Shore road said, "We do not own the Nickel Plate," then it would be something of which we ought to have proof that is more definite and more admissible as evidence. Nobody has ever disputed it, however. I think it is common knowledge. When we get a statement from the Interstate Commerce Commission that such is the fact I think it is sufficient evidence to act on in the Senate, especially when it is merely asking for information from the Attorney General.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he would be willing to broaden his resolution so as to ask for similar information in similar cases of combinations as, for instance, by the purchase of stock, or otherwise, in the case of the Southern Railway; the Seaboard Air Line; the Louisville & Nashville; the Illinois Central; the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe; the Great Northern; the Northern Pacific; the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul; and some 20 or 30 other railroads which have combined with railroads in their territory during the time the Sherman Antitrust Act has been in force?

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection. Why does not the Senator bring in such a resolution, however? It is not any defense to this resolution to say, "Why, there is another combination existing somewhere." In my judgment, the Senator can not cite a single instance in the whole United States where there is a combination of so many railroads for so long a distance that ought to be competing, and that are so nearly parallel, and in the same territory, as in this particular instance of the New York Central.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I was led to make that inquiry of the Senator somewhat because he read from a letter from a firm of brokers relating to the subject. I have had several printed communications from that firm of brokers which indicated to me that they were interested in the stock of the New York Central Railroad——

Mr. NORRIS. They are; they are stockholders.

Mr. WEEKS. And perhaps they were not "long" of the stock. It seems to me that if we are going to have this kind of an investigation it should be general enough to cover all similar cases in the United States, and not pick out one system of railroad for this kind of an attack, because the Senator knows that the forcing apart of a great system like the New York Central, where the combinations were made some 20 years ago, can not be done without serious damage to the operations of the road and to the security holders.

Mr. NORRIS. I take it, then, that the Senator thinks the Department of Justice was wrong when it undertook to dissolve the Central Pacific and the Southern Pacific, and that the department was wrong when it commenced the action in the Northern Securities case?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I am making no statement of that kind.

Mr. NORRIS. It has to take one case at a time. I have no objection to the Senator making all the investigation he wants to make. I should be glad to support a resolution, if he will bring in one, in some other combination similar to this. I do not think the Senator ought to call on me to do it, however. He ought to do a little of that kind of work himself. I have had so much of it already that I am criticized, often unjustly, and almost always very severely; so I should like to unload some of this work on the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I suggest that if this kind of information is going to be requested it should be made general enough to apply to all similar cases.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if I did that, I would be met with all kinds of objections. They will say, "Why, here is the worst kind of a slam at the Attorney General. Here is the worst kind of an insult. You have got a dragnet. Give us a bill of specifications. Tell us what you know about this and that, and make it specific." That would be the answer. When I make it specific, then they say, "What evidence have you here to show that the Nickel Plate is owned by the Lake Shore? What evidence have you to show that the West Shore road has been leased to the New York Central? What evidence have you to show that the Michigan Central is owned by the New York Central?" and so forth. If I branched out and took in what the Senator from Massachusetts wanted, I would have such a volume here that we would be in session 40 years without being through it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I was going to suggest, along the line of my former question, that this preamble, as drawn, is substantially a finding of facts; and I doubt whether the Senate ought to place itself upon record as finding these allegations to be facts without some further investigation or some further evidence.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me ask the Senator, then, whether he wishes to say at the beginning, "Whereas it is currently reported" or "generally believed," or something of that sort? If the Senator thinks that would help the resolution any, I am willing to put it in.

Mr. POMERENE. I should very much prefer something of that kind; and for that very reason it seems to me the resolution ought to be referred to a committee, so that they could investigate it and report upon it and modify it in some way that would be in harmony with the information we now have on the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. We have the information, I think. Has the Senator any idea that anybody, either here or elsewhere, is going to deny, for instance, that the New York Central owns a controlling interest in the Michigan Central, or that the Lake Shore owns the stock of the Nickel Plate?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have no knowledge whatever on the subject.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator is not satisfied with my statement, is he not willing to take the statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission? Does he want to make an issue here of something that will be admitted by these people if they get into court? Are we going to strain at a gnat in order to get up an issue and get into a dispute here about something that everybody admits is true?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not propose to be either technical or captious about this matter; but when I am asked to make a finding of facts I want some evidence on the subject, or else I want to modify the resolution in some way that will be in harmony with the information which we have; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. I have asked the Senator about the evidence. Does he not think the statement of the Interstate Commerce Commission is good evidence?

Mr. POMERENE. It is information upon which I can form a belief. I do not think it is even evidence.

Mr. NORRIS. I will admit that it would not be evidence in court, probably, the way I have offered it here. I am not disputing that. The Senator must not think, however, that somebody is being tried here, that we are trying a lawsuit, and that we have to be just as careful before we pass a resolution to have it demonstrated and proven in the Senate as we would if we were trying as case before a jury. We have never yet done that in the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator has substantially stated my objections. He has embodied in this preamble a finding of facts.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. And he is asking the Attorney General for his conclusion of law based thereon.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I admit that.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I rise to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he could, consistently with his purpose, accept as an amendment, on page 3, under the paragraph of the resolution, line 3, after the word "railroads," the words "if existing as," so as to read:

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the various combinations of railroads, if existing as above set forth, are in violation—

And so forth.

Mr. NORRIS. I should be very glad to do that. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. I am very glad to have that amendment made.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will allow me to intrude upon him for a moment, I must make perfectly clear my attitude.

I live in Chicago, as is known, and one of these railroads runs into the city where I live. It is of public record that I appeared as the counsel for a minority stockholders' interest in a suit seeking to prevent some of the things recited in the preamble as they were alleged then to be. The Senator from Nebraska and myself have had some conferences touching the form of his resolution.

My solicitude is this: I wish to be very, very plain. I do not feel that any friend of the Attorney General of the United States on this side of the Senate should at this time permit himself by any observation to be put in an attitude that would encourage the charge that is being made in the public press from time to time that the Attorney General sought to circumvent an investigation and examination touching the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. If there shall appear on this side of the Chamber objections that partake of technical form on the part of those who are known to be friends of the administration and the advocates of it, as to this investigation, there will undoubtedly go forth from certain other sources the charge that it is proven that the Attorney General is opposed to these forms of investigation, because the friends of the law department on this side of the Chamber sought to intercept a similar investigation as to the New York Central as that which it is charged the Attorney General himself wanted to frustrate in the New York, New Haven & Hartford case.

Consequently the objection made by the able Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] seems to me to turn only and solely on the point that the preamble recites findings of fact without qualification, whereas they wish to have it understood that if those facts exist the Attorney General might or could do certain things. For that purpose the words which I dared interpolate in the Senator's resolution, it seems to me, would make the situation to be that the Attorney General is to offer an opinion if such facts as cited in the preamble do exist. For that reason I took the liberty to ask if the amendment could be accepted in that form.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 14385.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask consent that the Senator's request be complied with, if I may be allowed to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution goes over without prejudice.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to submit a conference report on Senate bill 2860. I ask the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I am pleased to say to the Senator that we have succeeded in securing an amendment to the amendment proposed by the House in accordance with what seems to be the desire of the Senator, so that under the amendment as it stands section 1 of the act will be permanent in character and section 2 only to have effect for three years, if it is adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2860) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert, after the word "That," with which the amendment is introduced, the words "section 2," so that the amendment shall read:

"SEC. 3. That section 2 of this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval."

And the House agree to the same.

T. J. WALSH,
ATLEE POMERENE,
WM. S. KENYON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

W. W. RUCKER,
R. F. BROUSSARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Senator from Montana succeeded in making a very satisfactory arrangement about the matter. As far as I am concerned, I am entirely willing that the conference report shall be agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that on Monday next, immediately after the close of the morning business, I shall address the Senate on the pending bill.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, so much has been said on the subject of canal tolls that I feel that I do but scant courtesy to this body in presenting my views upon it. There are, however, certain conditions concerning it, and which accompany it, that I feel it a duty to set forth for your consideration before the debate is closed and the measure is finally passed upon.

If it is conceded that we have agreed to admit the passage of all vessels, both foreign and domestic, which are engaged in the foreign or our own coastwise trade through the canal on the same terms, it must be admitted that we have made a bad bargain.

It has been urged by some eminent Members of this body who are Democrats that we did make such an agreement, and by others equally as eminent and who are members of the same party that we did not do so, and still others, who are equally as eminent in its councils, have argued eloquently upon both sides of the question with equal poise and certainty of conviction.

To add to the confusion, upon the other side of the Chamber we find stalwart Republicans, members of the old guard, differing with one another in respect to the terms of the treaty and our obligation under it, and the Progressives are also divided in the same manner.

In addition to this confusing state of affairs, we are confronted by some Democrats and all of the Republicans with one of the planks in the Democratic platform, upon which we stood so proudly before election, which declares in favor of the exemption from tolls for American coastwise shipping.

In an effort to neutralize the effect of this other Senators invite our attention to another plank in the platform which nullifies the one referred to, and denounces subsidies as un-Democratic, and proceed to prove that the first plank is not to be considered, inasmuch as it is an indorsement of a policy which practically subsidizes an interest already protected; all of which serves to call attention to such a diversity of policies and doctrines in the Democratic platform as to leave plenty of room for honest difference of opinion as to its meaning in regard to this subject—in which respect it bears close resemblance to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Viewing the subject "by and large," as sailors say, and after carefully reading some of the speeches which have been made upon the subject and listening to others, I have come to the conclusion that the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are obscure and subject to so many different interpretations that it ought to be abrogated at once, and for that reason if no other. In respect to the Democratic platform, one will depart from one or the other of the doctrines which it sets forth whichever way he votes.

I find under the terms of the treaty, the meaning of which is not disputed by anyone, that if two vessels of the same tonnage, one owned by citizens of this country and the other by citizens of some foreign country, should sail from the same port in Europe, loaded with the same kind of a cargo, and both pass through the canal, that both of them would have to pay the same amount of tolls for the privilege of doing so, and the idea has suggested itself to me that under such conditions the owners of the foreign bottom would be quite free from all obligations incurred in the construction of the canal and also free from the payment of any interest for the debt which was incurred in its construction, as well as from the cost of maintenance and for patrolling it, both by land and sea, all of which will amount to an enormous sum, while upon the other hand the owners of the American vessel would be held liable to pay their share of these expenditures, that the American owners of ships by these conditions will be placed at a disadvantage with the foreign-owned vessel in competing with it for the business of the world, and that, however small or large the difference may be, to the extent that it exists it is, in fact, an actual discrimination against our own shipping, and is also, in effect, a rebate or subsidy in favor of foreign-owned vessels.

Under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, article 3, subdivision 1, there is a statement that—

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

If it is contrary to the policy of this country to pay subsidies to the shipping interests of its own citizens, it seems to me that it is obnoxious to grant what is practically a subsidy to the citizens of other nations with whom they will be compelled to compete for business.

Nearly all foreign nations whose ships will use the canal will refund to the owners of such vessels the amount which they expend for tolls, while on the other hand our ships will have no such relief granted to them. This condition of affairs will inevitably result in that portion of our shipping engaged in foreign commerce and using the canal being driven off the sea, and I can see no way of its escaping that fate.

It may not be out of place at this time to call attention to the contention made by some that $300,000,000 of American money is invested in ships which fly foreign flags and are engaged in carrying freight and passengers—mostly immigrants—to this country.

These vessels owned in part by American citizens, whose tolls through the canal will be paid by the foreign nation whose flag they fly and under whose laws they are registered, are also said to be subsidized by those nations to keep on hand and readily available a complement of guns and ammunition, and are outfitted in every way to act as auxiliary cruisers and scouts to destroy the shipping of this Nation in the event that war should occur between the two nations. The conduct of such citizens is an act of treachery to this country and should be dealt with as such, instead of being favored at the expense of the rest of the more honorable people of this country. These same vessels whose welfare has been so well guarded by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are busily engaged in flooding this country with immigrants from Europe, and thus are at work in harmony with, if not in actual conjunction or partnership with, those other large interests who use this cheap labor in order to keep down its price. By this conduct they establish a condition whereby there ensues keen competition in the labor market, and by the continual repetition of this process and the pitting of newer importations of laborers against those already here they not only dodge the law which forbids them to import it, but also make a profit by the transaction, and in addition have brought about a condition of unrest in the affairs of this country that should cause all right-thinking citizens to pause and take notice. A continuation of the exploitation of the people and resources of this Nation in this manner by those so dishonest as to engage in it will, in my opinion, in the not distant future create a "Villa" in this country, and the scenes now being witnessed in Mexico will be repeated here, and attempts to cure the condition by means of legislation that does not go straight home to the mark are sure to fail.

I am willing to concede that the policy of granting subsidies has nothing to do with the tolls question, yet it must be conceded by all that it will have a practical and direct bearing upon the shipping interest of this country of far-reaching importance in the near future and may prove vital to it.

In respect to our coastwise shipping I have come to the conclusion that, so far as the people of the Pacific coast are concerned, it will make no great difference in the general results whether the vessels engaged in that trade go through the canal free from tolls or pay them, for in neither case, in my opinion, can they hope to compete successfully with foreign bottoms carrying the same class of freight from the ports of British Columbia to the north of us; and that the construction of the canal will in fact and in many ways benefit the people of that country more than it will us. My reason for making this statement is that under their laws their ships can and do employ crews of Asiatics, the individual members of which work for wages ranging from $6 to $8 per month, while our ships are compelled to pay wages ranging from $20 to $30 per month.

Also the foreigner competing with us for that trade can purchase his vessel abroad for about 30 per cent less than our citizens can procure the same type of vessel in this country. This reduces the interest charges on the investment and the amount which must be marked off for depreciation, which is an item of considerable importance on such property. All of the other expenses which go to make up the cost of the operation of their vessels are less than those of vessels of the same class owned in this country. For these reasons they will be able to and will carry potatoes, apples, hops, salmon, and other articles of commerce from, say, Vancouver, British Columbia, to the Atlantic seaboard after paying the tolls for from $1 to $2 a ton less than our ships can afford to carry the same articles, and in the case of lumber from $3 to $4 less per thousand feet, even though our vessels are exempted from the payment of such tolls. This means that they will force that trade away from our coast cities and into their own ports. Freedom from tolls for such shipping will be a measure of relief, but will not entirely relieve the situation. This is an unfortunate state of affairs, and some remedy will have to be provided for it, else a large portion of our trade will fall into decay.

The remedies which have been suggested are either the throwing open of our ports free to the shipping of the world or the adoption of the La Follette seamen's bill, which will relieve us from the wretched duty which we have heretofore assumed of pursuing, capturing, and returning deserting seamen to foreign vessels. If we refuse to do this unclean work for them, their sailors would desert at every port, and foreign vessels would be compelled to pay the same rate of wages which are paid by our own ships in order to secure crews to continue their voyage. In addition, citizens of this country would have to be allowed to buy their ships where they could secure them cheapest. Any attempt to change our navigation laws so that our vessels would be enabled to employ Asiatic crews will not and should not be tolerated in this country, and that remedy is not to be considered.

In connection with this subject I deem it worth while to state that in many of the ports on the Pacific coast the most valuable water front and dock property is either owned and controlled by the railways or private corporations, and the people are excluded from them except on the payment of charges for their use. In the city of Portland, Oreg., where we have about 10 miles of water front on each side of the river, all of it until recently was in the hands of private persons or railway interests, with the exception of one street 60 feet wide, which was the only means of outlet the people of that city had to the harbor. Within the last few months, however, the people have purchased about 500 feet of water front for a public dock, which will be entirely inadequate to free the city.

It has been stated that if the tolls are rebated to the owners of coastwise vessels, it will prove to be of no benefit to the people for the reason that the shipping interests will pocket the same. Judging from their treatment of the people in the past, there is foundation for the belief that they will do this if they are allowed to do so, but that is another question which is not involved in the interpretation of the treaty or the question of tolls, and it is within the power of the people to stop it at any time when they take sufficient interest in it to do so. Until they do, however, I fear that the rebating of tolls will make but little difference to the producer or to the ultimate consumer, but if Congress would but do its duty by the people of this country in other respects it would help.

It looks to me on the face of the proposition as if this country had expended a large sum of money, amounting to nearly $475,000,000, and in addition had assumed the obligation of paying some $15,000,000 or $20,000,000 a year in addition for the privilege of driving its own citizens out of the shipping business and keeping them out of it afterwards.

We free the competitors of our ships from all liability for cost of construction and all fixed charges, and their tolls are repaid to them by their own nation, while our ships are held for all fixed charges and cost of construction and pay their own tolls in addition.

. A treaty under whose terms a country agrees in advance to do such a thing, and by so doing puts all of its shipping interests, both oversea and coastwise, out of business, is surely unique and speaks volumes for the lack of sagacity of the agents of this Nation who helped to draw it.

So far as I can see there is but one honorable way out of the unfortunate situation, and that is to abrogate the treaty and then enter into an agreement with all maritime nations under which every nation, ourselves included, shall pay for the use of the canal in exact proportion as they make use of it and in addition to set aside a sum sufficient to pay for the cost of its construction within a period to be estimated as its life.

If in addition to this an agreement for an international system of policing it on land and patroling it by sea, thus guaranteeing its neutrality and safety, were entered into, equity would be done to all and we would be spared a heavy expense and a long step would be taken toward international peace and comity as well. This would also tend to relieve the people of the earth from the grievous and unnecessary burden of maintaining rival navies.

If after that was done there could be made a further agreement by and under which all the seagoing war vessels in the world of every description could be gathered into one great flotilla over the deepest known spot in the ocean and all sunk on some specified day, the angels in heaven would smile when they witnessed the spectacle and the canal, now a source of contention and bickering, would prove a blessing to all nations.

I have tried to weigh this question without prejudice and without fear or favor to either side of the contention, and after having done so I have concluded that not only is there room for honest difference of opinion, but also that one man's opinion is about as good as another's concerning it.

I do not and will not question any man's motives, no matter which way he votes upon it, and I shall bespeak for myself the same courtesy and consideration.

If we refuse to make our coastwise ships pay tolls, it is said we will be accused of national knavery. If we compel such shipping to pay tolls while all others escape doing so, we will, no doubt, be accused of being fools. One must make his choice. I fail to find anything in the treaty which seems to me to say or which means definitely either the one thing or the other. At the same time by a series of deductions one can prove to his own satisfaction either side of the contention.

In respect to the question of subsidies, I repeat that I find that when both ships sail from foreign ports the foreign ship is by the treaty granted special and valuable privileges over our own ships, and in addition will no doubt have its tolls paid by its own Government, while we compel our ships to pay their own way in addition to their other burdens. This does not seem to me to be giving a fair deal to our own countrymen, and I am not in sympathy with it. I do not ask that our ships should have the best of the bargain; but I do object to seeing them get the worst of it, as they undoubtedly will in this respect.

As to the coastwise shipping, I have concluded that, owing to our laws, by reason of which the owners of our ships can neither employ labor nor buy ships as cheap as can their competitors, and also owing to the fact that our Government has undertaken to assist foreign ships to retain such cheap labor and at the same time continues to prevent our citizens from buying vessels in a better market, it is already so badly handicapped that it will perhaps be unable to compete for the business. I feel that to add to its burden at the request of a nation which has already in its grasp about all of the benefits which will be derived from the canal, and more than will accrue to this country, without its having expended one day's labor upon it or one sou marqué toward the cost of its construction, is asking a little too much. Not only that, but it so happens that the request that this country compel all its shipping to pay tolls for passing through the canal comes from a nation which will pursue exactly the opposite course itself and pay the tolls on its own shipping. In the old days on the Pacific coast, when a person who conducted business in a like manner made such a request he was promptly urged to hie himself to a warmer climate.

When the contention was first made that this Nation, under the terms of the treaty, was in justice to itself and in honor bound to its neighbors to repeal the bill which granted freedom from tolls to our coastwise shipping, I had given no study to the subject and was much impressed with what seemed to be an evident intention to deal fairly in the matter with all parties to it.

In arriving at a conclusion I have done so contrary to a predilection in favor of the assumption that my duty lay the other way. I have tried, however, to arrive at a just conclusion concerning it, and I am willing to concede that I may be mistaken. I have done so with considerable regret that I am unable to agree with those whom I esteem who take the opposite view. It seems to me, when all is said, that the question is one which merely scratches a surface which is underlaid with problems of far greater importance and significance to the people of this country, and that, so far as the bill is concerned, one can best serve his country by voting against it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Oregon, who has just spoken, I wish to know if it would be agreeable to the Senator to answer a question suggested by one of his statements?

Mr. LANE. I will answer it truthfully, if I can.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt of that, Mr. President. I call the Senator's attention to his statement that he thought it might be necessary to abrogate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or some such statement made by him. Assuming that it would be possible to abrogate a treaty which had superseded another treaty, a treaty of the nature of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, what would the Senator think had been accomplished to meet his views provided article 18 of the treaty with Panama, dated November 18, 1903, remained in operation? That article provides that—

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

Mr. LANE. The Senator's inference is that if we abrogate this treaty we will have a contention then and a matter to settle with Panama

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Not exactly; but if I may give my view of it, even if we could abrogate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty with Great Britain, what good would have been accomplished or how would the situation be improved, in the opinion of the Senator, unless we could also abrogate the treaty with Panama to which I have just referred, which is our title to the present Canal Zone?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I hear a voice in the rear, but I wanted the Senator from Oregon to answer the question if he could and then I would be glad to yield to the Senator from Idaho if he wants to ask me anything.

Mr. BORAH. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he takes the position in the question he asks the Senator——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I must decline to yield to answer a question now while I have one pending. I hope to get an answer from the Senator from Oregon before the Senator from Idaho can interpolate his view of the question. Therefore I have declined to yield to the Senator from Idaho, but if he insists upon speaking out of order against my protest and the Chair will allow him to do so I am helpless.

Mr. BORAH. I shall not insist in doing that, but I shall draw my own conclusion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That, of course, the Senator has an inalienable right to do.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I would go fairly and justly to Panama and make some arrangement with her, if I could do it peacefully, and I would be willing, if necessary, to arbitrate the question with her. I would be willing, for that matter, to make any arrangement with her which was honorable by which we could get rid of this other bargain, which is a bad one. It might pay to sell the canal and go and build another somewhere else. I think it would pay the country to do that. It would be cheaper in the long run to give it back to Panama and make her a present of a basket of doughnuts to accept the gift and to build another canal at Tehuantepec.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Without discussing whether the basket contained doughnuts or gold bricks or any legitimate article of commerce, do I understand the Senator to say that he would be willing to arbitrate with Panama the question of our title to the Canal Zone?

Mr. LANE. To what demand she might make upon us for our retention of that location, yes; or any other question in which there was a difference of opinion. I would be willing to pay some little boot under the present conditions to get rid of the obligation that we are said to be under to a country which is of more importance than Panama. I would throw in Huerta and Villa to boot.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I would agree with the Senator from Oregon about throwing in Villa et alia enormia, but, Mr. President, strong as I may be for peace and order and arbitration, I am not willing, as at present advised, to arbitrate our title to the Canal Zone after we have spent $400,000,000 on it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Connecticut takes his seat, I should like to ask him if he contends that article 18 of the Panama treaty has anything to do with our title to the canal?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I claim that article 18 is embedded in the treaty with Panama by which we got the right to construct the canal across the Isthmus; that it is just as much a binding part of the treaty as is any other part of the treaty; and that it is one of the conditions and considerations upon which Panama gave us the right to build and maintain the canal.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator claim that article 18 of the treaty was one of the considerations for the title, the violation of which would forfeit the title?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I claim that all agreements in the treaty made by both the high contracting parties are what constitute the treaty; and I assume that each side thought that what it put in for its own protection was part of the mutual considerations for the action of both or either.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the treaty with Panama makes plain what the consideration was for the title, and we might violate article 18 of the Panama treaty without affecting the title to the canal in the least, just the same as if I should grant to a person a piece of property by deed, and he should pay me $10,000 for the title. If he should enter into a separate and distinct agreement embodied in the deed, the violation of that agreement would not forfeit his title to the property which he had purchased under the deed. Under the Panama treaty we purchased a certain amount of ground; we paid for it; and we specifically stated in the treaty that we had paid for it with $10,000,000 and $250,000 a year thereafter. We specifically stated further in the treaty that no other terms in the treaty should affect the convention or its operation in any respect whatsoever. I do not understand how it can be argued for a moment that article 18 can affect the question of the title. We are bound by it the same as we would be bound by any other treaty obligation; to violate it would be a moral wrong the same as it would be to violate any other treaty obligation; but if any condition should arise which would justify us in abrogating that treaty, it would not affect the title which we have purchased and paid for. That title is ours; it comes to us by specific grant, for which we paid a valuable consideration, and the fact that the grant is found in a treaty does not change its legal import and conclusiveness.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, instead of having purchased and paid for the title, as I read article 14, it provides, in addition to the $10,000 which we paid—and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of $250,000 in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

Then it proceeds:

The provisions of this article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

One of the other benefits was:

ARTICLE 18.

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

But what I am saying, and what I asked the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] was, even if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were abrogated, the clause by which the United States agrees to maintain the canal in accordance with the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would be just as binding upon us.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly it would.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I want to ask the Senator from Connecticut if he has any doubt that the so-called Panama treaty, to which reference is now made was in fact dictated by the State Department of the United States?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why does the Senator from New York call the treaty to which he refers as "the so-called" treaty?

Mr O'GORMAN. I will omit the words "so-called" in speaking of the Panama treaty to which the Senator from Connecticut has just made reference. I mean the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, what is the question which the Senator from New York asks me?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is the Senator not aware that all the provisions of that treaty were in fact dictated by the State Department of the United States, and that Panama, at that time just emerging from a revolution, was in no position to insist upon any provision that was inserted in that treaty? That being conceded, I make the further suggestion that any provision in that treaty can be taken from it with about the same ease with which it was inserted in the first place.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Well, Mr. President, there are so many suggestions thrown out inter alia and obiter by the Senator that I should hate to say "yes" or "no" in answer to what he says.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will probably simplify the question by asking, Does the Senator from Connecticut entertain any doubt that the United States, without any delay or difficulty, could secure the consent of the Republic of Panama to the abrogation of article 18 of the treaty with that Republic?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator's views about this treaty, I should judge from the question he asks, are somewhat astonishing. This treaty with Panama, whatever the Senator's idea may be about the potency of the Republic of Panama, for all purposes of consideration here is as solemn and as binding an international agreement as was ever drawn between two nations——

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is not disputed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And it must be observed accordingly. It is absolutely immaterial at whose suggestion or under whose influence or persuasion the terms of the treaty were agreed upon. The treaty speaks for itself as the highest international contract that two nations can make; and the speculations which Senators may entertain as to whether the influence of the Republic of the United States of America, with all that that implies in the way of pressure, diplomatic and otherwise, would in the end prevail to eradicate from this treaty one of the provisions placed there for the protection of one of the high contracting parties, is a question that the Senator from New York is just as well able to answer as is any other Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I would value the Senator's own opinion, if he cares to volunteer it on the question, as to whether he thinks there would be any difficulty in the United States securing from the Republic of Panama consent to the abrogation of article 18 of the treaty.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suppose if this Government went to work with all of its international influence, and with the consequences in view on the part of the little, feeble Republic upon which its influence was brought to bear in the case of refusal, that we might get that provision out of the treaty, and that we might compel Panama to make another treaty; but that treaty is all the title we have on the Isthmus of Panama. Having obtained it, and having accomplished what we wanted to accomplish by the negotiation of the treaty, Panama having acted in good faith, I should hope that the United States would not now seek to compel Panama by pressure of any kind to waive something that was freely granted to her when she gave us this permission.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Idaho, I should like to put a further question to the Senator from Connecticut.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield further?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Connecticut to state, as a matter of law, that the disregard or the violation of a covenant in any instrument conveying title works a forfeiture of the title?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not state that, Mr. President. I did state, however, that this was one of the considerations for the making of the treaty. I do not consider a treaty to be a sort of an instrument by which the parties may, by a process of eclectics, obey that portion of the treaty which they think to be in their own interest and violate the other portion. Whether or not we could violate our agreements and stipulations in a treaty with them without hurting ourselves in other respects more than we help ourselves by the violation is a question of casuistics that I would not feel, offhand, qualified to discuss very deeply.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I should like, in order to ascertain the viewpoint of the Senator from Connecticut, to ask whether he disputes this proposition: That in a grant, whether it be by deed or treaty, a violation of a covenant, as distinguished from the violation of a condition, confers upon any party to the instrument a greater right than a claim for damages, if any be sustained, by the disregard of the covenant?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a treaty is not to be construed by one of the parties alone.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That scarcely answers the question, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very likely; but I am obliged to answer questions in my own way.

I do not regard this provision as simply a stipulation or an agreement which may be broken or kept irrespective of the other party to the treaty. I think this is a reservation by Panama. Panama had the sovereignty, and when she granted to us the right to build and operate a canal over her territory and put in the provision that when completed it should be open and operated in every respect according to certain provisions it was not a grant upon the part of either this Government or that other Government, but was a reservation which Panama made, she having the sole authority there.

I never have been one of the Senators who think when we got a right to build and maintain a ditch across the territory of a sovereign power for the purpose of operating a canal and putting our ships through there and paid money for it and agreed to pay rent for it at the rate of $250,000 a year forever under this specification; that for the purposes of the canal we had all the rights that we would have if we were sovereign; that Panama ever gave us any sovereignty there such as independent sovereign nations may maintain. And if the United States should abandon that canal or blow it up or refuse to operate it, I do not think under this treaty the United States would have any right to retain control of the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator state that the omission to pay the annual charge of $250,000 would operate as a forfeiture of the rights of the United States under the treaty?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have not stated that in terms, Mr. President, but the series of questions which the Senator is propounding evidently proceeds upon the theory that we can violate every provision in a treaty which imposes a burden upon us, and still hold good our title under the instrument whose provisions we are violating——

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Holding the other party to the full performance of the contract, while violating such portions of the contract as we have a mind to.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I have been very unfortunate in conveying my views if the Senator from Connecticut believes that I made any such statement as he has just announced. I have been insisting, however, and I make the claim with confidence, that the violation or disregard of a covenant in this instrument would not work a forfeiture of our rights to the canal, even though it might give a right to Panama to make a claim for damages sustained by Panama in consequence of any breach.

With particular reference to the provision regarding the annual payment of $250,000, there is a distinct stipulation in the treaty that any delay or difference with respect to that payment can not affect the rights conferred upon the United States under the treaty; in other words, if there be a delay or a dispute in respect to the annual payment of $250,000, and we should be wrong in our contention, the Republic of Panama could, by appropriate course, make a demand upon us for that amount annually; but our failure to pay it could not, under the express language of the treaty, impair in any degree our right to the zone through which the canal runs.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the question of a conditional title, which has sprung up in the debate in the last few days, was interesting, if not startling, when first presented. The claim is made that although we have purchased this territory and expended upon the Canal Zone some $400,000,000, yet we have only a conditional title, dependent upon one of the most uncertain things in the world, and that is the continuance in force of a treaty which we made with a nation other than the one from which we took title. Such a proposition would convict John Hay of criminal stupidity.

Mr. President, one only needs to review the express terms of this grant to see that no conditional title exists with reference to the territory over which we have built the canal, other than the condition that we occupy it for canal purposes. That is the only possible condition which would in any wise work a forfeiture in any way, shape, or form to any part or parcel of that territory over which the canal is built. I discussed this a few days ago, but as it has come up again I venture to suggest something further on the matter.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. WEST. Does the Senator think that the zone can be occupied for any purposes other than for a canal by this Government?

Mr. BORAH. I have just said that the only condition that can possibly be inferred is that we occupy the zone for canal purposes; but that the other terms, covenants, conditions, agreements, and so forth, which are embodied in this treaty might be observed or not observed, violated or otherwise, without affecting our title to the canal.

I am going to take just a few moments of the time of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to read a few lines into the RECORD from the grant:

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed.

Then it gives a more particular description of the zone. That is a grant in perpetuity of land for a specific purpose, to be used for a canal, and there is no condition to be inferred and no condition can arise out of the language other than the condition that it be occupied for canal purposes. So long as we occupy it for canal purposes, it is our territory in perpetuity; and there is no other condition in the grant which undertakes to work a forfeiture of it. Then the treaty provides:

ARTICLE 3.

The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement, and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2, which the United States would possess and exercise if it were the sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

There are no conditions either precedent or subsequent to that grant. But there is another clause which is even more definite and certain and unmistakable in its purport, and that is the clause which fixes the consideration and which says:

As the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of $10,000,000 in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention, and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of $250,000 in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

For the "rights, powers, privileges," and authority arising under this grant—which we must treat as a grant, notwithstanding it is in a treaty—we pay Panama the sum of $10,000,000, and when the $10,000,000 was paid the title to that property passed to us in perpetuity, and it is ours just as unconditionally as the territory upon which this Capitol rests so long as we use it as a canal. Our title could never be assailed until we should abandon the canal itself.

Furthermore, the treaty provides:

But no delay or difference of opinion under this article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

Further on there is a provision, which might be likened to a covenant in a deed, that when the canal is opened it shall be opened under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but no condition attaches to the grant in case it is not opened under the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; there is no provision to the effect that we shall forfeit anything in case we do not do so. We stand in the same position with regard to this title as if there were two separate instruments, one a distinct grant, under which we paid $10,000,000, and another an agreement; one affects the other no more than if they were two separate and distinct agreements.

Mr. President, the Supreme Court of the United States said:

It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect—

Speaking of the Panama Canal—and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation.

Certainly it belongs to us. We are under obligations to observe that treaty, just the same as we are to observe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or any other treaty; but its violation would not affect the title any more than the violation of a covenant of a deed would affect title under the deed, or any more than if I gave you my note for which you gave me a deed and I should fail to pay the note, you could go into a court of equity and cancel my deed because I failed to pay the note.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I merely want to add, with the permission of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], one word to what has been said as to what might be the effect upon our title of a violation to observe every provision of the Panama treaty. I said a moment ago that there was an express stipulation in the treaty that our title could not be affected in consequence of any dispute, contention, or delay with respect to the annual payment of $250,000. The language of the treaty goes even further than that, because it is provided in article 14—

But no delay or difference of opinion under this article—

That is the article that speaks of the consideration—

or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

That is as strong as language can make it and reserves to the United States the right at any time to assert its views respecting any of the other provisions of the treaty without impairing in any degree its title, which is granted by the second article of the treaty. If those words which I have just read do not give that reservation to the United States, then they serve no purpose whatever. In a word, that provision protects the title of the United States to the zone, leaving any dispute that may arise between the United States and the Republic of Panama under other provisions to adjustment, settlement, and determination without impairing in any manner the title of the United States to the zone.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, Senators may, of course, continue to hold any view they please as to how binding the different provisions of the treaty with Panama are or what effect the breach of any of them will have upon the title of the United States or upon the parties to the treaty. That has nothing whatever to do with the question that I asked the Senator from Oregon, which was, How would we be in any better position if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty were denounced and abrogated, unless we should also get rid of the provisions contained in article 18 of the treaty with Panama? We would be in no better position.

The Senator from New York suggests that, by diplomatic intercourse, we might get rid of the provision contained in the treaty with Panama which compels us to observe the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty made with Great Britain. Perhaps we might and perhaps we might not; it does not make any difference whether we would or not. The fact is that the conditions mentioned in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are embedded in the treaty we made with Panama, by which treaty we acquired the right to build the canal across the Isthmus. If we want to violate the provisions of the treaty with Panama, I suppose we could, as we could violate any other treaty if we wanted to do so. It is idle now to consider whether we would forfeit our title to our $400,000,000 and to our rights in the Canal Zone if we did violate this provision. The only point of my remarks, and the only point and applicability of this discussion at present, in my opinion, is that there is a covenant with Panama to observe the conditions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and to operate the canal under it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have given the pending bill more careful consideration than any similar legislation since I have been a Member of Congress, because there is a distinct impression that a failure to pass it would be a reflection on the honor of our country, and especially on the honor of those responsible for such action. That is a test which can not be neglected in any matter personal or national, and therefore I could not see my way clear to vote either for this bill without studying it from every viewpoint or vote against it without assuring myself that there are ample reasons to justify my so doing. I know that many of those in Massachusetts whom I am trying to represent have gotten the impression from press reports or perhaps from opinions expressed by others, many of whom have given it little consideration, that there is only one side to this question—the side which the President in his message to Congress March 5, 1914, describes in the following language:

In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901. But I have not come to urge upon you my personal views. I have come to state to you a fact and a situation. Whatever may be our own differences of opinion concerning this much-debated measure, its meaning is not debated outside the United States. Everywhere else the language of the treaty is given but one interpretation, and that interpretation precludes the exemption I am asking you to repeal. We consented to the treaty; its language we accepted, if we did not originate it; and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises just because we have power enough to give us leave to read them as we please. The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong, and so once more deserve our reputation for generosity and for the redemption of every obligation without quibble or hesitation.

I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

After long consideration I am convinced that the President is in error in his conclusions and that the course for Congress to take is to refuse to pass the pending bill.

In the debate which has taken place during the past month, and it has been most comprehensive and in many respects an unusually able one, various reasons have been advanced why the bill should be passed or rejected. I shall only refer to most of them briefly, because, in my opinion, there is but one real question at issue, and that is the language of the treaty. It is true that the economic features are very important and may have the most far-reaching effect, but, even if that were so and we were sacrificing large interests, there would be no other proper course for us to follow, if the treaty, which is in effect a contract, between the United States and Great Britain definitely and certainly agrees that we shall charge tolls on our coastwise and other shipping.

I attach no weight to the hysterical statements which have been made in the debate about foreign complications as a result of our not passing this bill. I have searched with some diligence for a warlike word or an angry protest coming from any other country if we decide to maintain our present position. It is possible that there have been received by the State Department protests of some kind against this action which have not been made public, but careful inquiry does not bear out such a supposition, and the press of other countries does not show any public sentiment in favor of such action, so I can not believe that the President and others who have used similar language have been justified in saying that our international standing is now below the usual standard or that our course in this matter is going to affect our relations with other countries. If the President has tangible information justifying his expressed opinion, he should submit it to Congress.

Neither am I inclined to place great reliance in the statement that the transcontinental railroads have been taking an influential part in attempting to influence the action of Congress. It may be that they have communicated with other Senators directly or indirectly; but if this has been done they have overlooked me. I do not recall that I have a single word in any form from any railroad corporation or those representing a railroad corporation relating to this subject. The transcontinental railroads probably have interests which may be affected—quite likely they are interested in the conclusion to which we come; and yet in its final analysis if the rates now being charged by railroads are not fair we have a vigilant Interstate Commerce Commission which is prepared to pass on them and to give the shipper justice in all cases. Furthermore, I am one of those who believe that, generally speaking, railroad rates are now quite as low as the conditions of transportation warrant if a reasonable return is expected on railroad capitalization, and if there are those who think that a payment in any form of canal dues will lower transcontinental rates to any considerable extent they will be, in my opinion, disappointed or, if not disappointed, they must be prepared to see serious troubles come to our railroad corporations.

My course in this matter has been influenced by the economic question which has been raised by those directly interested in coastwise shipping. I have no doubt plans have been made by existing companies to undertake business through the canal when it is constructed with the expectation that there would be no tolls charged, and if a change in this policy is made it may to some degree necessitate changing their plans and require a readjustment of the methods of conducting this business, but in the final analysis I am confident that the shipper in such cases will very largely pay the toll, as he will pay the other costs of transportation, and that the coastwise carrier will obtain substantially the same return on the business he does that he would if no tolls were charged. But the policy we adopt may and quite likely will have a material influence in developing not only our coastwise shipping, but our commerce in general; so that our action should be determined not only by the action which is best at present, but what will be best in the years to come. This canal should benefit our own shippers, our coastwise trade, and our general commerce, as well as be beneficial to the commerce of the rest of the world. Neither is it necessary for me to criticize the action which individual Democratic Senators propose to take in this matter. They are between the necessity of carrying out the recommendation of the President or following by strict construction the declaration of their party platform. None have been louder than they in their protestations to the country that a political platform should be lived up to and that it was political dishonesty to deviate from its provisions. It is for them to decide whether their consciences are sufficiently elastic to enable them to support a bill against which their platform makes a positive declaration.

But this furnishes an opportunity to make comment on the methods followed in making political platforms, to which the American people should give some consideration. Platform committees of national and other conventions meet at a time of great excitement. They appoint a subcommittee and frequently, as in the case of the Baltimore convention, that subcommittee appoints another subcommittee which draws the platform, so that two or three men at a time, when sane and careful action is impossible, prepare a code which is to serve as a political creed for many millions of voters. Any such procedure is supremely ridiculous, and political parties should adopt saner methods; at least, the platform should be prepared long before the convention meets; it should be submitted to the country in some manner and provision made for the adoption of tangible and reasonable suggestions which may be made as a result of this publicity.

A few days ago the senior Senator from Ohio delivered a most carefully prepared and very able argument in favor of the repeal, in which he went into in great detail the history of and principles governing waterway legislation and treaties relating to that subject. No man in public life has a broader knowledge of such questions than he, and I have so much regard for this knowledge that I hesitate to raise a doubt even to the conclusions which he reaches; yet it seems to me that there are radical differences between the Suez Canal and Panama Canal and all others, including those to which he referred. The Welland and most other canals were constructed to overcome obstacles in natural waterways and are supplemental to them. Furthermore, they are used almost entirely for commercial purposes and for no other purposes, and in the case of the Welland Canal, especially, the unfairness in the rates which were originally established was intended to build up local Canadian cities and Canadian business at the expense of the business of other communities, the course followed being similar to that used in the earlier days in granting rebates to our American railroads. That can not in any way be comparable to the policy which is now in force of granting free tolls to our coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal, for that does not in any way injure the commerce of other commercial centers or the shipping interests of other nations.

The construction of the Panama Canal was undoubtedly, to a very large extent, a war measure, combined with a desire to facilitate the commercial intercourse of the world. This was not true perhaps of the original construction of the Suez Canal, but the purchase of the stock of that canal by Great Britain was largely for military reasons. Great Britain had a great dependency in the East; the time to reach it around the Cape was so much greater than through the canal that if the latter were controlled by any other power it would have placed Great Britain, in defending its dependency, at a great disadvantage.

There are those in the United States who make it a business to develop war scares between our country and certain foreign nations. These incendiaries had endeavored to develop a public sentiment in favor of the construction and maintenance of a fleet on the Pacific similar to the present Atlantic Fleet, contending that our enemies might come from either direction and that it was unfair to either coast to leave it unprotected. If such a policy had been undertaken, it would have required the maintenance of two battleship fleets and would have cost, without taking into account extraordinary repairs, not far from $15,000,000 annually in addition to the cost of the construction of 20 battleships, which would have aggregated at least $250,000,000, and to this should be added the depreciation in battleships, which would have brought the total cost up to an enormous figure.

The arguments to which I have just referred, and many similar ones which have been more or less prominent during this discussion, may, in my judgment, be sidetracked, for the question which should really determine our action is the construction which should be placed on the words in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which reads as follows:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

What were the purposes of those who drew the treaty and of the Senate when the treaty was being considered by it? My own impression had been until recently that we were by the terms of the treaty in duty bound to treat all the shipping of the United States on exactly the same terms which apply to the ships of Great Britain and other nations, and in changing this conclusion I am not unmindful that some of those who were active in formulating the treaty have recently testified that the President's view of the controversy is the correct one; but I have failed to find that any consideration was given by the negotiators to the difference between general commerce and coastwise shipping, and the only evidence that it was discussed in the Senate took place during the consideration of an amendment offered by Senator Bard, of California, which especially precluded applying the terms of the treaty to coastwise shipping. It is true that this amendment did not prevail, but so many Senators who voted against it have stated that they did so because they thought it unnecessary and did not want to hamper the treaty with such matter rather than because they were opposed to the principle that it is a reasonable conclusion to draw that the Senate would have accepted this amendment if it had not supposed coastwise shipping did not come within the terms of the treaty.

I am, as briefly as possible, going to point out my reasons for believing that (1) the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not necessitate our compelling our coastwise shipping to pay tolls; (2) that there is no moral reason for our following such a course; (3) that the custom of all nations has been and is now to exempt coastwise shipping from laws, rules, and regulations applying to other shipping; (4) that equitable conditions would not obtain, whether we charged our coastwise shipping or not, because of subsidies granted to the ships of other countries; and (5) that this contention is undoubtedly advanced for the express purpose of adding another handicap to the development of our merchant marine which would result in an equivalent benefit to our commercial rivals.

When this question was originally considered, in 1850, Great Britain was our equal partner, and while at that time the building of the canal by the Governments was not given consideration, undoubtedly the necessary costs of fortification and maintenance, if there were such, were to be borne equally by the two countries. Under present conditions what has Great Britain done to justify our doing an unjustifiable act; that is, to show generosity to that country by giving up a form of sovereignty over what actually belongs to us as much as does the territory of the District of Columbia? The answer must be, Nothing whatever. On the other hand, she will be the most greatly benefited from a commercial standpoint of any nation by the construction of the canal; in fact, it is probably true that ships flying the British flag will make as much use of the canal as those belonging to all other nations combined. In addition to that, Great Britain will have available the $400,000,000 which we have expended in the canal's construction to develop her various industries, including her shipbuilding and shipping itself, so that in effect we will have used our capital to provide a means to enable our commercial rivals to increase the preponderance of advantage which they now hold over us, and this advantage will be increased from year to year, because still more of our capital will be necessary in order to maintain this great international development, for the cost of maintaining and protecting the canal and a reasonable interest on the investment will be at least twice any amount of money which can be received from tolls in the near future. The only possible harm that can come to Great Britain from our adopting the policy of granting free tolls to our coastwise and other shipping will come to the Tehuantepec Railroad Co.—this is more or less problematical—and the possible harm which may come to the shipping of the Dominion of Canada. But the shipping of the Dominion of Canada, at least all of any considerable moment, is controlled by the subsidized Canadian Pacific, Canadian Northern, and Grand Trunk Railroad Cos.

The total expenditure made by the Canadian Government last year for the encouragement of commerce was $2,703,200, and this stipulated that the lines of steamers receiving this subsidy shall not call at the ports of the United States.

What a travesty on justice and fairness it would be to forbid the use of the canal to ships owned by our own railroads and then make this enormous sacrifice to open the canal to the ships of the subsidized railroads of our commercial rival to the north. It can not do them any harm if we allow our shipping to go through free, because there is a certainty that a handicap exists equal to the tolls charged against American ships owing to the difference in the cost of construction and operation. But even if this were not so, there should not be an American who would be in favor of granting to the ships of a foreign country privileges which we refuse to grant to ships flying the American flag, owned and controlled by American capital. No contention of the kind which has been raised by Sir Edward Grey should have been thought of by that Government; they should have recognized the splendid privileges and opportunities which we were giving their shipping and the shipping of the world, and even if they had believed that they had a technically sound contention in the three points which have been raised by the English Government, reasonable fairness on its part should have led it to waive these objections and permitted us to manage our own canal and our own shipping without question or objection.

Quoting once more from section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty this language:

* * * so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions of charges of traffic or otherwise.

Just what is meant by the expression "or otherwise" I am unable to determine, but it is a fact that our shipping of all kinds is conducted under a serious handicap, due largely to the excessive cost of construction in this country and the excessive cost of operation, so that we are not on equal terms with the shipping of the world, and probably never can be. But in addition to these handicaps all other nations in the world in some form grant assistance to their shipping, so that it may compete successfully with that of other countries.

In this respect we are the trustees of the American people. It is our duty to build up our shipping industry, and especially our duty to see that no action is taken which is going to militate against it in favor of that of other nations; and the very course which we are now asked to take would be another instance of the aggressiveness and industry of another nation in trying to place further handicaps on our shipping. This policy is well illustrated in the action of European Governments in the use of the Suez Canal. It is true that rates through the canal are equitable, but in order that the shipping of the individual country shall not suffer by the payment of such rates it has become the fixed policy of most European nations to pay subsidies, so that to-day if we had any shipping in that part of the world it would not as an industry be receiving just and equitable treatment, because it would have the handicap of these subventions paid by European countries. It seems to me desirable to show just how comprehensively this course has been followed by our commercial rivals, and I submit herewith in detail the subsidies now paid for using the Suez Canal.

SUBSIDIES PAID FOR USING THE SUEZ CANAL.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

For the year 1910 Austria-Hungary paid $472.500. Until 1907 there had been paid for East African service an additional bounty of varying amount, but which did not exceed in any one year $300,000.

FRANCE.

In 1911 France spent $6,670,000 for bounties for construction and navigation and $5,530,000 for mail subventions. Of the mail subvention payment, $2,220,000 was paid to lines using the Suez Canal.

GERMANY.

One million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars are paid to German East African lines and the North German Lloyd for postal service through the Suez Canal. In addition, the German East African lines receive an indirect bounty in largely reduced rates furnished by all German State railways on goods exported from inland States of Germany to East Africa; and, generally speaking, all German State railways give reduced rates on German goods shipped over German State railways, and they are given a further preference when the shipment is continued on German steamships.

ITALY.

Subsidies for postal service in Italy are paid as follows: To the National Co. of Maritime Service, $1,840,000 annually. This line runs to India and China. To the Venetian Navigation Co., $200,000 annually. This line runs from Venice to Calcutta. In addition, there are navigation bounties amounting to $470,715, very largely paid to the National Co. There are also construction bounties fixed at a maximum of $440,000 per annum; $959,880 are allowed for construction bounties and losses due to customs duties on account of the remission of duties to various lines, a part of which applies to the National Co., using the Suez Canal.

JAPAN.

Japan allowed in the year 1911, $1,617,440 as subsidies to steamers employed in the European service, in addition to which there are various kinds of bounties for construction, repairs, and other forms of payment, a portion of which would apply to steamers using the Suez Canal.

NETHERLANDS.

In the Netherlands $125,000 annually is granted to the Java-Japan Line, in addition to which there are granted postal subsidies for five lines, one of which uses the Suez Canal.

PORTUGAL.

Portugal pays $20,000 for a line plying between Lisbon and Portuguese East Africa.

RUSSIA.

Russia made in 1912 an appropriation of $3,670,000 for the encouragement of its mercantile marine. Of this amount, between $395,000 and $445,000 is to be paid to Russian vessels using the Suez Canal, this being a sufficient amount to pay the Suez Canal tolls. This is not, however, the entire expenditure made by Russia to ships using the Suez Canal, because they would receive a part of subsidies paid for other purposes.

SPAIN.

A subsidy is granted based upon the speed of vessels, the mileage covered, and the displacement of ships engaged in the Asiatic trade. The total bounty paid for service of this character by Spain in the year 1911 amounted to $580,000. In addition, $148,650 was paid on account of shipbuilding bounties, some portion of which went to vessels engaged in trade through the Suez Canal.

SWEDEN.

Sweden has a large number of forms of encouragement for its shipping trade, including postal subventions, steamship lines, bounties on shipbuilding, and so forth. In addition to these, in 1907 there was an authorized subsidy not to exceed $102,775 per annum to the Swedish East Asia Co. to meet the expenditures incurred by the company in payment of the Suez Canal dues. This has since been reduced to an amount not exceeding $83,330 per annum, which is to cover 60 per cent of the Suez Canal dues.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Peninsular & Oriental Steamship Line passing through the Suez Canal connects Great Britain with the important ports of the East. This line is receiving at present $1,650,000 annually in bounties, and it has had liberal assistance since 1840.

AIDS TO CENTRAL AND SOUTH AMERICAN COMMERCE.

Undoubtedly the same practice will take place in using the Panama Canal; so that, even if the shipping of other countries pays tolls and ours does not, it will be, in reality, using the canal "on terms of entire equality." If we compel our ships to pay tolls, that will not be the case. It may be said that there is no certainty that this course will be followed by other countries. At least, it can be stated that it is being followed now, to some degree, in conducting trade between European and Central and South American countries. I herewith furnish, as far as I have been able to obtain it, a list of the bounties and subventions which are now paid to shipping engaged in Central and South American trade, in addition to the encouragement of navigation, shipbuilding, ship repairing, and other forms of bounties which, to some degree, inure to the benefit of lines of steamers engaged in this traffic:

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

Austria-Hungary pays $165,000 annually as a subsidy to the Brazilian service. In addition to this, the Austrian-Lloyd, which possesses a fleet of 68 vessels engaged in various trades, received a total, including subventions of different character, of $1,750,000 in the year 1910.

BELGIUM.

The Belgian Government remits all pilotage and other dues to vessels of the Cosmos Line engaged in South American trade.

BRAZIL.

The Brazilian Government has a contract, entered into September, 1912, with certain Italian steamship lines, the subsidy for this service being fixed at approximately $20,000 per round trip, two-thirds of which is paid by the Federal Government and one-third by the State government of Sao Paulo.

CHILE.

The Chilean Government pays the Compania Sud-Americana de Vapores $40,000 annually for service along the west coast of South America, and gives the Pacific Steam Navigation Co. (English) valuable facilities for discharging cargo at the Government wharves in Valparaiso.

FRANCE.

France pays for the Brazil and River Plate service $260,000 annually for postal subventions; $995,000 annually for postal subvention to West Indies, in addition to which $80,000 is added for the Mexican postal service. This includes a speed bounty. It pays $2,215,000 annual bounty for the New York and West India service. This is in addition to construction and other bounties which are paid, a portion of which would apply to vessels engaged in the North and South American services.

GERMANY.

The German lines' preference to Central and South American ports is included in preferential railway rates on German State railroads for various classes of goods, the definite amount of which, however, can not be determined.

ITALY.

Italy pays to the Genoa-Central American Line $100,000 annually, in addition to which there are large bounties paid for navigation, construction, and repairs, the total bounties for these purposes paid in the year 1912 aggregating $4,065,000.

JAPAN.

Japan paid in 1911 $2,330,000 direct bounties for North American lines and $372,560 bounties to South American lines, in addition to which large amounts in other forms of subsidies, which included, in 1911, $5,584,610 for the extension of steamship routes, $840,535 for encouragement of navigation, $563,975 for encouragement to shipbuilding, $2,550 for the training of seamen, $10,205 for subsidy to lifeboats—a total of $7,000,000, and this is only a part of the encouragements which are furnished by the Japanese Government for the development of the shipping industry.

MEXICO.

The Mexican Government paid for subsidies to steamship lines in the year 1911 a total of $275,000, which included $100,000 for service between Canadian and Mexican ports on both coasts; $96,155 to the Pacific Navigation Co. (English), and other smaller amounts to different steamship lines for near-by foreign service.

THE NETHERLANDS.

The Netherlands Government pays a direct subsidy to the Royal West Indian Mail Service of $28,375 annually.

PERU.

The Peruvian Government pays $150,000 per annum to the Peruvian Steamship & Dry Dock Co. for various services, including the use of the company's steamers as auxiliaries in time of war. The company's steamers are also exempted from the payment of shipping dues.

SPAIN.

Spain pays two lines of steamers—the North of Spain sailing to Cuba and Mexico and the other sailing from Mediterranean ports to New York, Cuba, and Mexico—a subsidy based on sailings, speed, distance, and displacement of ships, in addition to which it pays shipbuilding bounties in various forms.

GREAT BRITAIN.

To the Royal West India Steamship Co., $400,000 annually; to the Pacific Co. operating to Central and South American ports, $162,500, in addition to which $350,000 has recently been added to cover west-coast service.

That this policy is almost sure to be extended is indicated by a report made by our consul at Nantes, Walter H. Schulz, incorporated in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports of May 7, 1914, as follows:

WESTERN FRANCE AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

[By Consul Walter H. Schulz, Nantes, France, in Daily Consular and Trade Reports, May 7, 1914.]

That the French Government and the chambers of commerce of western France are thoroughly alive to the potentialities of the Panama Canal and the influence that that canal will exercise on the commerce of France in Pacific waters was demonstrated again by recent developments. The public press and the chambers of commerce of Nantes and St. Nazaire after a study of the economic consequences attending the opening of the canal have petitioned the Government to further subsidize the Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, and this with a view of extending to Valparaiso, Chile, the present Havre-Bordeaux and St. Nazaire-Colon service. A postal agreement, similar to the one of 1911, it is thought, would be sufficient for that purpose.

The Compagnie Générale Transatlantique perhaps is the most important of French lines. Since 1884 it has received a subsidy from the French Government, and a regular service by two lines has been maintained between France and Central America in consequence—the Havre service and the St. Nazaire service. It is now proposed to extend its field of operations into the Pacific, and if the Government can be induced to lend its aid, direct steamship communication between France and the west coast of North and South America is assured. The fact that the French Government refunds Suez Canal tolls to another well-known French line is cited as a precedent, and gives rise to the hope that similar action will be taken by the next Parliament with regard to the use of the Panama Canal by the French merchant marine. It is estimated that the canal tolls for a round trip to Valparaiso will be $6,176 to $7,720.

The Nantes Chamber of Commerce also has recommended inquiries with a view of establishing direct steamship communication between Nantes, St. Nazaire, and the north Pacific coast, including the principal ports of California and Canada, but the chamber counsels that no definite action be taken in this matter until the effect of the canal upon commerce generally is better understood.

Five of the six sections of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relate directly to the use of the Panama Canal in time of war. If any one of these rules is to be considered from one standpoint, they must all be considered from that standpoint, and among them will be found the following propositions: That the canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised, nor any act of hostility be committed within it; that a belligerent shall not revictual or take any stores in the canal except such as are strictly necessary; that the transit through the canal shall be promptly made; that no vessel shall embark or disembark troops or munitions of war or warlike material in the canal except on account of an accident, and that transit even in such a case shall be resumed at the earliest possible moment; that these rules shall apply to the waters adjacent to the canal; that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters for longer than 24 hours at any time; and that one belligerent shall not follow another within 24 hours of the departure of the first vessel. Can it be possible that anyone believes that these rules would prevent the United States from maintaining men-of-war in the canal in time of war or doing the other things which they prohibit to the men-of-war of other nations; that it would be necessary for a United States vessel of war to leave the canal in the shortest possible time; and that it could not leave this vantage point within 24 hours of the time of the departure of the enemy with which we were in an actual state of war?

The United States has been under treaty obligations since its first treaty with Granada, adopted in 1846, to protect the Isthmus and to maintain neutrality of the transit across it. It has frequently landed troops to carry out this treaty provision, and the acquisition by the United States of the territory through which the canal has been constructed would seem to be sufficient to modify the Hay-Pauncefote treaty so as to accord belligerent rights to our men-of-war in the canal district.

If that is the case, it is difficult to see how discrimination can be made against vessels of commerce under similar circumstances, as they are covered by the same language in the treaty; so if the vessels of war of the United States have a different status from those of other nations, then undoubtedly vessels of the United States engaged in commercial pursuits, foreign and domestic, must be included in the same category. For instance, would it be claimed that a vessel of the Panama Railroad Co., the stock of which is owned by the United States, engaged in carrying a cargo through the canal is to pay toll, and if so, if such action would be taken in case the vessel were carrying material owned by the United States for construction purposes on United States works?

Suppose, for example, that a bill which is now pending in the Senate Committee on Naval Affairs should be adopted and we established a line of Government steamers to the west coast of South America, would it be claimed that we would have to pay tolls on a Government vessel engaged in commerce for the people of the United States conducted by the United States? And will anyone contend for a moment that if an English or French or German ship under the control of its Government passed through the canal that tolls would not be charged? Of course, if we charged tolls in such a case we would be simply transferring money from one pocket to another; it would be equivalent to the Government paying for departmental mail. I think no contention will be made that in such a case we should be compelled to pay for the passage of our own ships.

It was even proposed in the bill which passed Congress in 1912 that vessels belonging to the United States, including those of the Panama Railroad Co., the stock of which is owned by our Government, were not bound to pay tolls on the same terms as vessels of foreign nations.

We have provided that shippers of freight in the United States shall receive just and equitable treatment from the transportation companies, yet if the construction freight belonging to railroads and the transportation of the railroad employees and officials were paid for at the same rate charged other shippers, it would undoubtedly modify the rates charged to other shippers and to other travelers. It seems to me that this is on all fours with the use of the canal; that it would be absurd to charge tolls on a vessel engaged in carrying material through the canal for the construction of United States works.

In effect, the Government of Great Britain admits the contention that our men-of-war are exempt, for in its note of protest of November 14, 1912, this language is used:

> Now that the United States has become the practical sovereign of the canal, His Majesty's Government do not question its title to exercise belligerent rights for its protection.

Therefore the suggestion that vessels of war of our country should pay tolls or any part of the United States forces should not have absolutely free use of the canal under all conditions seems untenable, and that the limitations placed on the use of the canal for other belligerents should not apply to our own. If this is admitted, how can we divorce five sections of article 3 to which this subject applies from section 1 of article 3, which is the one in controversy?

REASONS FOR CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

The basic claim which Great Britain has to a part in the canal construction and control is of a shadowy character, but in order to clearly show this I shall have to refer briefly to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, which was replaced by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made because of the unusual events which had transpired immediately preceding 1850. Our northern boundary had been extended to the Pacific Ocean on the forty-ninth parallel; we had acquired from Mexico a large area, including the coast of California; the Republic of Texas had become a part of the United States; and, most important of all, the gold discovery of 1849 had diverted a large emigration to California. It was extremely dangerous to cross the plains, and therefore the long and tedious trip around the Horn or the shorter but more or less dangerous trip across the Isthmus was found necessary in order to reach this new El Dorado.

Naturally, these conditions attracted renewed attention to the necessity for a canal, and at that time the Nicaragua route was the one generally considered most feasible. We had acquired valuable concessions from Nicaragua, but by a course of action including the seizure of an island for debt and the assumption of a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast, which, at least, had in it very little equity, Great Britain had acquired control of the Atlantic end of what would be the Nicaragua Canal. Therefore the necessity for a treaty with Great Britain which would cover the proposed development. It will be seen that entering into a treaty of this kind would not have been necessary if we had been able to maintain the Monroe policy, because it not only recognized Great Britain's supposed rights in Central America, but it provided for a joint protectorate of a public development which was to be undertaken on the American Continent.

As soon as the Civil War and the contentions arising out of it had been sufficiently adjusted, attention was directed to this treaty and its lack of applicability to the conditions which had developed since it had been agreed to. The real incentive in making the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in addition to obtaining a clear title to the Atlantic coast end of the canal, was the hope and expectation that English capital would be interested in its construction. It was for this reason that our Government surrendered the exclusive privileges which it held and expressed this sacrifice in the seventh article of the treaty in this language:

> That no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal.

It was not, at that time, even suggested that the money to build this canal would be furnished by the Governments of the United States or of Great Britain; it was assumed that it would be private capital, and the completed work should be under the joint protectorate of the two countries. Private capital was not available in the United States and there was not sufficient incentive for English private capital to go into such an enterprise.

Time was lost and nothing substantial had been done toward the building of the canal when the conditions developed by the Spanish War, especially in sending the Oregon from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast, again attracted attention to its necessity. It was then that our Government approached England with a proposition to arrange a new treaty to replace the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the purpose being to bring that instrument down to date.

PANAMA AND OTHER TREATIES.

Article 19 of the convention entered into between the United States and the Republic of Panama on November 18, 1903, provided that an exception should be made in favor of vessels of the Republic of Panama in the conditions prescribed for the vessels of other nations, and this is one of the three protests made by Sir Edward Grey after the canal act of 1912 was passed; but it will be noted that, although we had apparently departed from the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in our later treaty with the Republic of Panama, that no notice was taken of this by Great Britain or any other country until it had become desirable for other reasons to protest against the canal act of 1912.

Secretary Knox, in his reply to Sir Edward Grey, under date of January 17, 1913, covered the objections made in this language:

> The United States has always asserted the principle that the status of the countries immediately concerned by reason of their political relation to the territory in which the canal was to be constructed was different from that of all other countries.

Immediately after the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which was proclaimed in February, 1902—in fact, but three days after its ratification by the Senate—a bill was introduced in the House of Representatives for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal. It was promptly taken up and passed the House January 9, 1902—within three weeks of the time of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The bill then came to the Senate, where it was considered. Everything in the bill after the enacting clause was stricken out, and what is now known as the Spooner Act was inserted in its place. Section 6 of that act reads as follows:

That in any agreement with the Republic of Colombia or with the States of Nicaragua and Costa Rica the President is authorized to guarantee to said Republic or to said States the use of said canal and harbors, upon such terms as may be agreed upon, for all vessels owned by said States or by citizens thereof.

This bill passed the Senate June 28, 1902—within six months of the ratification of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it was passed by the same Senate which had ratified that treaty, which presumably knew what it was doing—and as a result of the passage of this bill Secretary Hay negotiated a treaty with the Republic of Colombia, which was signed January 22, 1903, and promptly ratified by the Senate, but failed of ratification by the Republic of Colombia. This was known as the Hay-Herran treaty, in article 16 of which this provision is found:

The canal when constructed and the entrance thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with all the stipulations of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

And following that, article 17 of the Hay-Herran treaty provides as follows:

The Government of Colombia shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels, troops, and munitions of war at all times without paying charges of any kind.

This would seem to be in direct contradiction with the position now taken by the British Government, as being in violation of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and it must be remembered that this entire action was taken within one year of the adoption of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that John Hay was Secretary of State and had to do with the drawing of both treaties.

In the meantime Panama had seceded from Colombia, and had entered into international relations with this country. A treaty was made with Panama, signed November 18, 1903—Mr. Hay still being the Secretary of State—in article 18 of which we find the following:

That the canal shall be subject to all the conditions provided in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

And in the following article this reservation is made:

The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind.

It should be noted that this treaty was also made by Mr. Hay, and no protest was made in either the case of the treaty with Colombia or the treaty with Panama.

Later, in 1909, a treaty was negotiated between the Republic of Colombia and the United States, drawn presumably by Senator ROOT, as he was at that time Secretary of State, which made provisions for the conveyance through the Panama Canal of troops, materials of war, and ships of war of Colombia without paying any toll to the United States. This treaty was ratified by the Senate January 24, 1909, but was not ratified by the Colombian Congress. I quote the language covering the reference which I have made:

ART. 2. The Republic of Colombia shall have the liberty at all times to convey through the ship canal now in course of construction by the United States across the Isthmus of Panama the troops, materials for war, and ships of war of the Republic of Colombia without paying any duty to the United States, even in the case of an international war between Colombia and another country.

Presumably when this treaty was made we were giving a valuable right which we were supposed to have to give, notwithstanding the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in settlement of any claims which Colombia might have to the territory included in the Canal Zone resulting from the secession of the State of Panama.

President Taft, in his message to Congress in December, 1911, uses this language:

I am confident that the United States has the power to relieve from the payment of tolls any part of our shipping that Congress deems wise. We own the canal. It was our money that built it. We have the right to charge tolls for its use. Those tolls must be the same to everyone; but when we are dealing with our own ships the practice of many Governments of subsidizing their own merchant vessels is so well established in general that a subsidy equal to the tolls, as equivalent remission of tolls, can not be held to be a discrimination in the use of the canal. The practice in the Suez Canal makes this clear.

In the message to Congress of August 19, 1912, President Taft said:

After full examination of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of the treaty which preceded it, I feel confident that the exemption of the coastwise vessels of the United States from tolls and the imposition of tolls on vessels of all nations engaged in the foreign trade is not a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

I believe it is a generally recognized principle that all contracts should be considered from the standpoint of the conditions and circumstances which existed when they were entered into. A treaty is a contract between two nations, and therefore the conditions which existed at the time of the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty should be considered in reaching a conclusion in this case.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was under consideration it was not supposed that the United States was to construct a canal through its own territory or even that the United States was to furnish the money with which to carry on the work, and that therefore it was not necessarily to exercise sovereign power over the territory covered by the waters of the canal. There were many conflicting and confusing conditions in the situation—concessions and treaties and vested rights of various character to be provided for. I believe it is a fair statement that the contracting parties, when this treaty was made, assumed that the United States was to have general superintendence of the conditions under which the construction of the canal was to be undertaken; that the canal was to be under its influence and its protection; but that the thought of the United States acquiring the Panama Canal Zone or building the canal on its own account had not even been given consideration; that those who were insistent on the Nicaraguan route as being the better one of the two in the hearings before the Senate committee not only advocated this route, but stated that all the money necessary to construct a canal by that route would be furnished from private sources without seeking the aid of any Government.

No one will contend that these were the conditions which existed when Congress passed the act of August, 1912. In the meantime the United States had become the owner of the Canal Zone, and therefore was sovereign of that territory. It had used the money of the people of the United States in the construction of the canal, and, in fact, not a single one of the fundamental conditions which existed were similar to those which prevailed 10 years before; so, in taking the position which Congress did in 1912, it was not varying from the traditional policy of this country, for it has always adhered to the policy of protecting its coastwise commerce.

The United States has substantially 30 treaties now in existence with other nations in which the language used is similar to the language used in the section of the rule which we are discussing. Yet in substantially every case our negotiators inserted a provision that the treaty did not apply to coastwise ships. An illustration of this form is found in the treaty between the United States and Denmark of 1826, which uses this language:

Nor shall higher or other charges of any kind be imposed in the ports of one party on vessels of the other than are or shall be payable in the same ports by native vessels.

And in 1887 our country in a treaty with the Republic of Peru used this language:

No higher or other duties or charges on account of tonnage, lighthouses, or harbor dues, pilotage, quarantine, salvage in case of damage or shipwreck, or any other local charges shall be imposed in any ports of Peru on vessels of the United States than those payable in the same ports by Peruvian vessels, nor in any ports of the United States on Peruvian vessels than shall be payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States.

Yet in both of these treaties the paragraphs relating to coastwise shipping provided that it should not be included in the general declaration. It is also true that England has until recently adhered to a similar policy in reference to coastwise vessels.

As far as I am informed, with the variations applying to specific conditions, the whole history of diplomatic relations not only in England and the United States but in the case of all commercial countries the exempting of coastwise trade from treaties and conventions has been made and limitations on duties and charges imposed in other trades have been provided for in the coastwise trade. One of the acts during the brief life of the Republic of Texas was to make a commercial treaty with Great Britain, ratified on November 13, 1840, in which this language was used:

The stipulations of the present treaty shall not be considered as applying to the navigation and carrying trade between one port and another situated in the dominions of one contracting party by the vessels of the other, as far as regards passengers, commodities, and articles of commerce, such navigation and transport being reserved by each contracting party to national vessels.

There is reliable authority for the statement that, including the thirty-odd treaties in which the United States has exempted its coastwise shipping after using phraseology similar to that in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and the 31 treaties in which Great Britain has made a similar provision, that 47 commercial countries have in one form or another pronounced themselves in favor of holding intact for home use the coastwise trade of their countries, and, practically speaking, that covers every commercial country in the world.

I furnish some examples of the manner in which coastwise trade is limited in cases of colonial and detached coast lines.

Germany, Holland, and Denmark limit the preference to national vessels engaged in such trade to the aid given the German railways and other subsidies. France reserves to herself the trade between her Atlantic and Mediterranean seaports and between France and Algeria. In other cases her carrying trade is open to foreign vessels on equal terms with French vessels. Portugal, except in special cases, reserves the trade with her over-sea possessions. Spain gives a preferential duty on colonial products brought to Spain in Spanish bottoms. Russia, since 1900, treats all trade between Russian ports as coasting trade reserved to her own vessels. This even includes trade between European and Asiatic ports.

As regards the home coasting trade proper, all countries which reserve wholly or partially the trade with distant possessions reserve the home coasting trade, though in several countries the coasting trade is open on conditions of reciprocity.

In the British Empire the trade between the United Kingdom and the British colonies, and also the intercolonial trade, is free from any restriction as to nationality of the vessel. In the case of Canada the coasting trade is only open on the condition of reciprocity, the foreign countries whose vessels are at present allowed to participate in it being Italy, Germany, the Netherlands, Sweden and Norway, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Belgium, and Argentina.

The amount of trade done by English vessels in coasting trade of Great Britain compared with foreign vessels indicates that substantially all British trade is carried in British vessels. In the year 1902 loaded English vessels in the coasting trade clearing for that year amounted to 62,220,558 tons, while foreign vessels amounted to but 374,977 tons; and in the British colonial trade local vessels amounted to 11,172,000 tons clearing while foreign vessels amounted to 1,118,000 tons, due quite likely to higher entrance and clearance charges for foreign than domestic vessels.

If the instances given are not sufficient to prove the contention, the language used in the treaty which concluded the War of 1812 may be cited as additional evidence, I think, sufficient to illustrate this point.

This treaty provided that the vessels of the United States should have access to British ports, and that no "higher or other duties or charges" should be made upon them than upon British ships, yet during the entire life of that treaty no American ship has entered a British port on the same terms as a British coastwise vessel, and we have never made the contention that the treaty was violated. As an illustration of this difference existing to-day, at the port of Bristol British coastwise vessels pay 19 or 20 cents entrance and clearance, while American vessels pay 56 cents entrance and clearance, and the same general difference obtains at other English ports. The treaty which I am quoting also provided that no "higher or other duties or charges" should be made upon British than upon American vessels in American ports, and yet there never has been a British ship admitted to an American port on the same terms as our American coastwise shipping. There has been, as far as I know, no complaint that the treaty has ever been violated, and in the frequently quoted case of Olson against Smith, Mr. Justice White disposed of the contention that British ships were entitled to the same terms as American coastwise vessels by declaring that there was no merit in the contention; that the treaty to which reference is being made did not in any sense place British ships engaged in a foreign trade on the same footing with the coastwise vessels of this country. (Olson v. Smith, 195 U. S., 344.)

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901 reads as follows:

> The United States adopts as the basis of neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say.

In the original Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1900 the phraseology was very different. It read:

> The high contracting parties—
> Meaning Great Britain and the United States—
> adopt the following rules.

It seems to me that this change in phraseology is very significant. The Senate refused to approve the language which made Great Britain one of the parties to provide regulations and rules for the government of the canal, evidently claiming that, as we were building the canal and as we had established a tariff of $1.20 a net ton, incomparably cheaper, taking into consideration the cost of the enterprise, than the prevailing rates through the Suez Canal, that the United States should make the rules governing the conduct of the canal and not permit another nation which had no interest in any of the expenditures to join in so doing.

Now, article 3 goes on to say:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable

The whole contention in this situation is the words "all nations." If the words "all other nations" had been used there would be no case for us to consider. We might at once forget the interest which the railroads, the coastwise shipping, foreign nations, and all others affected by the building of the canal have, because there would be no question raised as to our right to take such action in this matter as we saw fit. It must be remembered that it is the United States that is making these rules, and I believe that when it says "all nations" it means "all other nations," and does not include itself in that category. We are the owners of the canal; we are opening the canal to the commerce of the world, charging for its use a just, reasonable, and proper rate; we are to charge under this rule the same rate to all nations; we are to keep the canal open under all conditions, not only to commerce but to vessels of war, and we are stating the terms under which commerce can use our property.

It should also be noticed that the language relating to this rule says:

> The vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules—

Does anyone contend that we would make rules to admit our own ships to our own canal and compel them to observe rules applicable to others in time of war? Of course, any such proposition is absolutely untenable if not ridiculous. Neither is it sound to say that ships shall be admitted which agree to observe the rules. That language was rejected by the Senate, and it is now specifically stated that it admits ships which observe the rules rather than those agreeing to do so.

It is said—and I believe correctly stated—that the sentence—

> Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable—was added at the instance of the British negotiators; at least, it was not in the first draft of the treaty; but it is now contended that British ships were to be given the same terms as American ships. If that is true, why should it be desirable to stipulate that they should receive just and equitable treatment? It would seem that the proposer of that sentence believed that the just and equitable treatment applied to ships of all nations other than the United States and that the United States had full power to accord such treatment as seemed best. Certainly it—the United States—would not be likely to accord treatment to its own shipping which was not just and equitable.

Mr. Olney has pointed out in his discussion of this question that a nation can never lose its sovereignty except by express and specific language, and that this principle was enforced by The Hague Court in the North Atlantic Fisheries Arbitration against the United States.

Those who favor the repeal bill have frequently assented to the version of the treaty to the effect that we had a right to let our vessels go through the canal free, but that it is impolitic to do so; that we have certain rights in our relations with our neighbors, but that we do not exercise those rights because they would injure our neighbor by so doing, and the Senator from Mississippi the other day quoted Burke in saying:

> If I am the owner of sheep, I have the right to shear my sheep in winter; but I do not do it merely because I have the right.

I fail to see how that is comparable with this situation. If we exempt our coastwise ships from paying tolls, we are not harming Great Britain by so doing, because the toll which Great Britain is paying is reasonable and is not sufficient to maintain the canal in any case. If we prefer to make up a deficiency in operating the canal in one way rather than another, that is the business of the United States. Neither would we be harming ourselves by so doing necessarily, as in the case of shearing the sheep in winter, because we may decide that the maintenance of shipbuilding industries and of an active coastwise fleet which may be used in time of war for auxiliary purposes is preferable to requiring the payment of tolls.

In his address delivered by the President to Congress March 5, 1914, he uses this language:

> * * * and we are too big, too powerful, too self-respecting a Nation to interpret with a too strained or refined reading the words of our own promises.

Does not this language apply with equal force to Great Britain? We are the two great English-speaking nations; for every reason we should act sympathetically in such matters of international importance. There are many reasons why our people are in keen sympathy with those living under the British flag. There should be no question raised by either which is going to be seriously detrimental to the interests of the other, unless there is some large principle involved or some great interest jeopardized if such question is not raised.

Now, what are the demands of Great Britain in this instance? They are three in number: First, that no tolls are to be levied upon ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States; second, that we have exempted the vessels of the Republic of Panama from paying tolls; third, that a discretion is given the President of the United States to discriminate in fixing tolls in favor of ships belonging to the United States and its citizens. The reason given for making this protest is essentially a selfish one, namely, that if such policy is carried out it may increase the proportional charge which other ships will have to pay in using the canal. Is this a broad and generous ground for Great Britain to take? Is it not true that even including our coastwise shipping the ships of Great Britain will make five times as much use of the canal as the ships of our country? Is there any contention that the rate fixed for tonnage is an unfair or unreasonable one? Is it not true that the maintenance of the canal will under any circumstances cost twice as much as the tolls which will be received? I think there will be no question as to the soundness of these statements. I contend that there is no good, valid, broad reason for Great Britain injecting these technical contentions into this subject.

Looking at this whole question from the broad viewpoint of international comity, we are in far the stronger position, because we have made all the sacrifices in the past and are going to make all the sacrifices in the future which have been made or will be made in connection with the building and operation of this canal. We are not in a position to make a large use of its facilities, and this is entirely limited to our own citizens trading with our own citizens. This does not concern Great Britain or any other country, and therefore it seems to me that the position taken by our former partner is not only extremely technical but is ungenerous and unwise.

Congress is acting as a trustee for the American people, as it does in treating all international subjects. A trustee should invariably deal honorably and justly, but he has no right to be generous, as the President suggests we should be in this case. Even if the question of generosity should enter into this controversy by whom should the generosity be shown—to the United States by Great Britain or to Great Britain by the United States? It was not originally contemplated that our Government would furnish the money to build the canal, which we have done. No one dreamed that we would pay Panama $10,000,000 and make other valuable concessions to purchase the canal strip so that the canal would be constructed through our own instead of through foreign territory. It was not supposed that we would pay the French company $40,000,000 for a quitclaim deed to their rights, and no consideration had been given to the claim which Colombia might have for a large money consideration and other concessions for a relinquishment of the claim of that country to the Panama territory. It is true that this last question has not been settled, but it probably is a fact that a considerable payment will necessarily be made in order to do justice to that country. I doubt even if it was contemplated that the canal would be fortified, and certainly no thought was given to the possibility that this country was to assume the expense of erecting fortifications, manning them, and maintaining them for all time. In addition to these sacrifices which we have made is the necessity to maintain a health standard which will in itself facilitate commerce and furnish the shipping of the world facilities to promptly replenish their supplies, thereby not only making the canal a transit from one ocean to another, but in effect a depot of such general character that every condition met in seafaring life may be readily supplied.

The small point raised that we give the vessels of Panama free transit through the canal can not be now or in the future of any importance, because it is not likely that the vessels of that Republic will cut any figure in the commerce of the world. Neither is there any probability that the President will make use of the privilege which is given him to charge discriminatory duties in favor of our ships engaged in the foreign trade, although he would be amply justified in giving them the equal benefits which the ships of the various nations have or will have in the amount of subsidies which they receive in some form from their own governments. The longer I consider this question the greater grows my amazement that the English Government, dependent as they are to a great degree on the good will and cooperation of our people, should have assumed such a narrow, technical, and unwise position. We do not know what is going to develop in the future. We see a treaty which seems to be applicable to conditions at one time absolutely inapplicable at another. Some day we may be engaged in a great war. We are sure to have many perplexing problems develop from time to time, and I maintain that, in the first place, we are not in honor bound to grant the concessions demanded by Great Britain; that there is nothing in the treaty which compels our doing so, and that there is nothing in the economical situation or the great international question which may develop in the future which warrants our doing so.

The President has said that he does not know how to deal with questions of greater delicacy and greater importance in our foreign relations. I do not know what these questions are. If he refers to the Mexican question, nothing we can do in the Canal Zone will affect the inextricable confusion which exists there to-day. That is beyond redemption. If there are other political complications, I have not heard of them, and they should be submitted to those who are to pass on this question before they are given consideration.

I have no disposition to indulge in that rather harmless but common practice of making the eagle scream. Our strength with other nations will not, in my opinion, depend on making unnecessary concessions harmful to our own interests. We have been continuing for many years a policy relating to our shipbuilding industry and shipping interests generally which is a reflection on our intelligence and foresight as a Nation. It would seem as if we were at the lowest stage possible in this course, and yet there are two other steps which might be taken which would wipe out effectually and finally every vestige of what is left of our merchant marine. The first step would be to pass this bill, certainly preventing any possibility of our developing a foreign commerce under our own flag unless we pay large subsidies for so doing, and the other would be to adopt a provision, which has some if not many supporters, to remove the restrictions which we have allowed our coastwise shipping since the adoption of the Constitution, a course which has been pretty consistently followed, as I have pointed out, by all other nations. Under conditions as they exist to-day the removal of the restriction limiting coastwise shipping to our own ships would in a few years effectually wipe out every vestige of shipping which we have on the high seas. I am not prepared to take that step; I am not prepared to take any of the steps which are proposed in this bill. The longer I consider it the more insistent I feel that it is most inadvisable, and when the American people understand it I feel sure that they will vigorously resent the action which the Senate seems likely to take.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the Panama Canal tolls bill be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT OVER DECORATION DAY.

Mr. KERN. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday next at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

The motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent that the naval appropriation bill be placed before the Senate for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The pending amendment is the amendment of the committee passed over on page 56 at the instance of Mr. O'GORMAN. The committee proposes, beginning on line 20, page 56, with the word "One," to strike out down to and including line 4, on page 57, as follows:

> One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, the object of the committee was not to absolutely restrict the Navy Department in the matter of the place of building the two battleships provided for in the bill. The object of the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] is very clearly to force the department to build one of these ships in a Government navy yard.

I think that we all admit the necessity of maintaining the Government navy yards, and I am sure that the department fully recognizes that necessity. I am morally sure if the committee amendment is allowed to stand and the Secretary of the Navy is unhampered in the matter, that one of those ships will be built in a Government navy yard; but if the amendment prevails it may be, while one of the ships may be built in a Government navy yard, it will be at a very much greater expense to the Government than it would be if the committee amendment is allowed to stand, for then the Government would have absolutely no discretion. The navy yard could bid up to the full amount and the department would be forced to accept the bid.

This is simply in the interest of giving the Government a fair show in the matter, so that it will not be at the mercy of the Government navy yard to exact all that it can on account of the fact of there being no competition whatever between the Government navy yard and a private navy yard.

I repeat, the department wishes to see the Government navy yards maintained; there is no desire at all on the part of the department any more than there is on the part of the Naval Affairs Committee to starve out any of the Government navy yards. On the contrary, we recognize the necessity for maintaining those yards, but at the same time the committee does not think that the navy yard ought to be put in the position of being allowed to exact more than it should have, which it will have the power of doing if this amendment is stricken out, but which it will not have the power of doing if this amendment of the committee is allowed to remain.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the Senator from Louisiana not refer to the private shipyards?

Mr. THORNTON. No, sir; I did not mean the private shipyards. I meant exactly what I said. Mr. President, I will repeat the proposition, as the Senator from Mississippi does not seem to have understood me. The proposition is simply that if the committee amendment is allowed to remain the department is not forced to build one of those ships in a Government navy yard; but if the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New York prevails, the Government will be forced to do so. Therefore the Government navy yard could exact a much greater price for the work than it could if there were competition between it and a private navy yard. I have no doubt that one of these ships will be built in a Government navy yard if the committee amendment stands, but I also have no doubt that if the amendment is rejected and if the amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from New York is adopted, that the ship will be built at a much greater expense to the Government than it otherwise would be.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The distinguished Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] did not intend it, but one would get the impression from his remarks that the Government, in relation to its own navy yards, stands in the same position it occupies in relation to the private shipyards of the country. I can not see the force of the suggestion that the Government will be at the mercy of its own shipyards. It is a contradiction in terms. The navy yards are part of the Government.

I shall offer an amendment which will perpetuate in this bill a plan that has been in vogue during some few sessions of Congress, and which has had the approval of the country, and that is, where two battleships are to be built, one of the two shall be built in a Government yard. There are many reasons why that should be so.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does not the bill as it came from the other House make such provision?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Not exactly. I will state what the provision is.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to understand the provision.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The bill as it comes from the other House provides:

> One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard—

If it stopped there, it would be quite satisfactory, but it continues—

> and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

There is but one Government navy yard at the present time equipped to construct a battleship; that is the Brooklyn Navy Yard, which represents an expenditure of public moneys of $40,000,000. There are some other yards. There is one at Norfolk, Va.; there is one in Pennsylvania; there is one on the Pacific coast, where, with an equipment which would cost not $200,000, but probably $600,000, a modern battleship could be constructed. I imagine that the inspiration of this provision as found in the House bill is that Representatives interested in some of these navy yards which are not now equipped to build a battleship, supposed that the Secretary of the Navy might be induced to designate one of these other navy yards—as he might under the House provision—as the navy yard where one of these battleships would be constructed. In that connection there is this proposed appropriation of $200,000; and the best judgment available, the only information that has come to me, is that if one of those yards were selected and the $200,000 placed in the yard for the purpose of equipping it, it would be but a short time before representations would be made to the Navy Department, and then to Congress, asking additional appropriations, aggregating altogether $600,000, before any other Government yard in this country would be equipped to build a battleship.

One reason that may be offered why the provision of the House bill, which reads—should not be retained by itself is that at the Brooklyn Navy Yard there is at the present time in course of construction a battleship. The keel of that battleship was laid on the 16th of March last. I was present at the ceremony, and I heard the commandant of the navy yard declare that the construction of that battleship, known as No. 39, would be a record breaker, and that in 10 months it would be turned out of the yard completed. Ten months from the 16th of March would be the 16th of January, 1915.

It will be claimed, I imagine, before this discussion concludes, that if this provision remains as I ask to have it remain, it will involve some delay in the construction of one of the two battleships provided for by this bill; but from information which I have received from officers of the Navy Department, if any delay whatever is involved, it can not exceed three months. The Secretary of the Navy himself said to me that the delay, whatever it is, will not be appreciable; and by the time the plans are completed and the contracts let probably seven or eight months will elapse; so that, in any event, it would involve a delay of but one or two or, at the outside, three months before the construction of the proposed new battleship could be commenced in the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

What are some of the advantages of supporting the one fully equipped navy yard that we possess? As I have said, the Brooklyn Navy Yard represents a governmental expenditure of $40,000,000. The one battleship now being constructed there will be finished probably in January of next year. They have a force of men, aggregating, I think, from three to four thousand, especially qualified, skilled, and equipped for this employment. If there is no other battleship to be constructed, as soon as No. 39, now on the ways, is completed, that force must disband. As was repeated here so often yesterday, and as I have heard the Secretary of the Navy declare, our Government navy yards are part of our national defense. They must be maintained, and they ought to be maintained, at a high standard of efficiency. How can you maintain a high standard of efficiency in the one great navy yard which the Government owns if you will allow legislation on the naval bill to work a discontinuance of the activity in this yard? As I have said, there is a force there now of three or four thousand men, who are as well equipped for this work as men in any part of the known world; and it ought to be the policy, it seems to me, of Congress to arrange to have a new battleship built in that yard just as soon as the one which is now under construction there is completed.

There are interests in this country which look with disfavor upon the building of battleships in our own navy yards. It is sometimes stated that it costs more to build a battleship in our own yards than in private yards. I heard it stated in the Naval Committee but a day or two ago by the distinguished chairman of the committee, in the presence of all the members, that there was a time not many years back when the private shipbuilding interests of the country had sufficient influence with respect to legislation and with respect to the conduct of public departments to make it appear by a fictitious and erroneous system of bookkeeping that a ship built in a Government yard was far more expensive to the Government than a ship built in a private yard. Not many years ago it required from five to six years in a private yard to turn out a battleship, a dreadnaught. The shortest period in which a battleship was ever constructed was the period taken by the Brooklyn Navy Yard in the construction of the battleship New York, which was completed in five months' less time than her sister ship, the Texas, constructed in the private yard at Newport News, where I am told that four battleships can be constructed at one time.

One great advantage of encouraging our own yards is not only to keep a sufficient equipment of skilled labor ready at any time to be at the service of the Navy, but it also operates as a regulation on the charges imposed by the private builders of ships. I think, Mr. President, that the best interests of the service and the best interests of the American people will be promoted by incorporating in this bill a provision, substantially similar to the provision which has found a place in like bills during the last six years, that wherever two ships are built, one shall be built in a Government yard.

I submit this amendment to the Senate committee amendment. I may say in this connection that, although a member of the Naval Committee, I was unavoidably detained by the session of the Senate on the day when this particular matter was receiving the attention of the committee and I did not have the opportunity at that time, of which I now avail myself, to present the merits of the suggestion which I now offer to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, beginning at line 20, it is proposed to amend the amendment reported by the committee by retaining the words:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will endeavor to state to the Senate in a very succinct manner the issue involved in the amendment presented by the Senator from New York.

This bill provides for the construction of two battleships. The department recommends that it shall have the option that is carried in the bill reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate of building these ships either in a private yard or in a Government yard, as it may see proper. The committee of the House, after hearing the matter fully, reported the bill, leaving this option to the Government, as desired. In the House the amendment which the Senate committee, following the action of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House and the recommendation of the department, left out of the bill, was put on the bill after a very strenuous fight on the part of Members in the House of Representatives.

The amendment of the Senator from New York, if adopted, would compel the Government to build one of the battleships in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. If that amendment prevails, it will be impossible for any other navy yard anywhere in the country to make estimates for or to have the privilege of building one of the battleships provided for. Consequently, the question for the Senate to determine is whether, against the protest—I will not say "protest"—but against the recommendation of the department and against the recommendation of the Naval Committee of the House and against the recommendation of the Naval Committee of the Senate, we shall build one of the battleships proposed to be authorized in the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

I want it distinctly understood that if the bill prevails as reported from the committee it is optional with the Government to build a battleship in a Government yard or not, as it sees fit. If the battleship can be completed in time, and if it can be constructed at a reasonable price, the department will have the authority under the bill as reported by the Senate to construct a battleship in the Government navy yard at Brooklyn or elsewhere, as it thinks the best interests of the Government may require. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York is simply an effort to force the department, against its judgment, against the judgment of the Naval Committee of the House, and against the judgment of the Naval Committee of the Senate, to build one of the battleships to be authorized in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. That is the issue presented to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, is the Government to be forced to construct one battleship in the Brooklyn Navy Yard regardless of what it will cost the Government?

Mr. SWANSON. Regardless of what it will cost, because in the case of a ship constructed in a Government yard only estimates are made. When you start to build a ship in a Government navy yard, if you appropriate $7,800,000 for the construction of the ship and the cost runs up to eight or nine million dollars, the department is compelled to come back to Congress with a deficit and ask for a further appropriation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether, in his opinion, either one of these battleships can or will be constructed anywhere for $7,800,000?

Mr. SWANSON. When battleships are constructed by private yards under bids the yard is required to construct the ship at the price for which the contract is let. The Government makes its specifications, bids are called for, and, when accepted, the cost of the ship can not exceed the amount provided for in the appropriation, because the ship is constructed under a contract calling for a sum not in excess of the amount appropriated.

Mr. TILLMAN. The amount appropriated in the pending bill provides for the hull alone, and not for any armor or armament.

Mr. SWANSON. As the Senator from South Carolina states, the appropriation contemplates the construction of the hull alone, and does not provide for armor or armament.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Answering the question of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST], I desire to say that just preceding the paragraph that I desire to have retained in the bill there is a provision that two first-class battleships shall be built, to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $7,800,000 each; so that in no event, whether the ships be constructed at a Government navy yard or by private enterprise, can more than that amount be expended for a ship.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, that is the limit of cost. If the ship is constructed under contract, the contractors will be compelled to build it at the contract price; but if the Government proceeds to build it at a Government navy yard, then it is built on an estimate, and if the price runs up to eight million or nine or ten million dollars the Government will be compelled to appropriate the money to complete the ship. That is because there is no fixed and determined contract price in the case of a ship constructed at a Government yard, but the yard simply makes an estimate, and that estimate may be exceeded.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will say to the Senator that was so in the case of the battleship New York.

Mr. SWANSON. That has been the case with one of the ships built in the Government navy yards. I believe the Government ought to have navy yards capable of building ships in order to compel private shipbuilders to build for the Government at reasonable, fair, and just prices. I think some of the other navy yards in the country should also be equipped to compete with the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

Mr. President, let us see the reason why the Secretary of the Navy and why the Naval Committee of the House and the Naval Committee of the Senate have said it is unwise to enact this compulsory provision here at this time. The Secretary wrote a letter to Mr. PADGETT, chairman of the Naval Committee of the House, as follows:

MAY 5, 1914.

Hon. LEMUEL P. PADGETT,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. PADGETT: As you will see by the inclosed memorandum—

Which I shall read to you later—

the technical bureaus disapprove the building of a battleship either at New York or Mare Island out of the coming appropriation. This simply means that we are not yet prepared to do what I would wish. Next year it would look more propitious. New York will have launched No. 39, and without further expense we could start another battleship; this year is too soon.

* * * * * * *

In any event, I hope you will be able to leave the department to act as may be best, with only the usual legislation defining the placing of all building in navy yards in the event of a combination.

Very sincerely, yours,

JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

That is the request of the Secretary of the Navy that it shall be left optional with him whether this battleship shall be built in a navy yard or by private contract. Here is the memorandum showing that it should not be required that a battleship should be built at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The following questions are asked and answered:

What delay would it occasion if one of the new battleships were ordered built at the New York Navy Yard?

That is a question that was asked the department.

Here is the delay in connection with the hull:

Hull: The keel of battleship No. 39 was laid March 16, 1914. The average elapsed time between laying of the keel and launching, in the case of the last six battleships, is about 15 months. Since battleship 39 is considerably larger than either of those ships it will probably require at least 15½ months from the date of laying keel until date of launching; that brings her date of launching about July 1, 1915. If battleship No. 40 or 41 is to be built at New York Navy Yard, this would place the earliest date of laying of her keel about July 15, 1915. The plans and specifications for battleship 40 and battleship 41 will be ready for advertisement about August 1, 1914; opening of bids about October 1, 1914; placing of contract about October 15, 1914. If one of these vessels is to be built at the New York yard, the keel should be laid by March, 1915. It is probable, therefore, that there would be a delay of at least 4 months on this score—in the case of the new battleship. The New York yard is not equipped with draftsmen and other facilities for the rapid designing of details for two battleships of somewhat different design, even though one be at a considerably advanced state of construction.

That is for the hull. Now for the machinery:

It is estimated that a delay of about one year would result so far as the machinery is concerned.

If this ship is required to be built in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, there is no use in making the appropriation for it this year. We will meet here in December. If there is a delay of a year in the machinery and of at least six months in the construction of the hull, it is useless to make an appropriation for this battleship and wait a year in order that the Brooklyn Navy Yard may get this contract.

With that condition and the fact that the navy yard at Brooklyn is now working to its full capacity, and will be so working until the 15th of July, according to the memorandum furnished the committee by the Secretary of the Navy, there is no occasion for holding up this work for the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Congress will meet in December. Another appropriation for a battleship will be made then, and this question of compelling one to be built in a navy yard can be properly brought before the Senate at that time.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator states that there is no need of holding up this work at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. I should like to ask whether there is any particular reason why these ships should go to the Newport News Ship Building Co., a private trust?

Mr. SWANSON. I will say that it is not a trust, Mr. President. There are nine shipbuilding yards in this country. The contract is given to the lowest bidder at the lowest cost to the Government. I see no reason why one trust, the Government shipbuilding trust at Brooklyn, should be given all of this work. Whether it is a Government trust or any other trust it does not deserve to be supported more than any other.

There is no reason why work all over this country should be suspended, and the use of the battleship delayed, in order that the one governmental trust in the construction of battleships shall have work a year from now. That is the proposition of the Senator. If he is antagonizing trusts, why does he insist on keeping the Brooklyn yard a shipbuilding trust?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Does the Senator consider that the Government of the United States is a shipbuilding trust because one of its navy yards is so equipped that it can build a battleship?

Mr. SWANSON. If it has but one yard that can build a battleship, and can make only one estimate for it, then, so far as Government construction of ships is concerned, the Brooklyn yard is a Government monopoly in shipbuilding.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator explain the difference between the Government being a trust when it comes to shipbuilding and the Government being a trust when it comes to making powder? I remember the Senator's remarks of yesterday, in which he thought the Government ought to have a monopoly when it came to making powder.

Mr. SWANSON. I will explain that to the Senator if he wishes me to do so. There are certain things for which the Government is the only possible customer. Smokeless powder for the Army and Navy is made for no other customer than the Government. No other people use it except the Government.

Mr. WARREN. What about battleships, then?

Mr. SWANSON. I will come to that. Consequently a plant equipped to make smokeless powder or a plant equipped to make armor is equipped for one purpose only, to make powder or armor for the Government. In the construction of ships, however, with all of their various ramifications, a shipyard can build small ships and large ships; and the yards that are in this business have more outside business than they have for the Government.

An armor plant has no customer except the Government. A smokeless-powder plant has no customer except the Government. In the case of a shipbuilding plant, however, the Government work forms only a small part of the business done by it. The reason why private plants generally have been able to build ships cheaper than the Government shipyards has been because they do other business and keep their forces together, and the expense is distributed over both governmental work and private work, but in the armor plant and the smokeless-powder plant all expenses of every kind and character are charged up to the Government. It is not so in private shipyards. That is one reason why the private shipyards have built ships cheaper than the Government yards.

I have here a statement showing that the Connecticut cost $374,000 more than the Louisiana, a sister ship built by contract.

The Florida cost $2,269,000 more than the Utah, a sister ship built by contract.

The Jupiter cost $590,000 more than the Cyclops, a sister ship built by contract.

The New York cost $1,463,000 more than the Texas, a sister ship built by contract.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I will yield in just a moment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I wish to ask a question with reference to the statement the Senator has just made.

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask to have this statement from the department, contained in a letter written to Representative JONES, included in my remarks. I will not read the names of all the ships that come later.

Mr. REED. What is the date?

Mr. SWANSON. It is in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 26, 1913.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Navy-yard built.	Cost about—	More than—
Connecticut	$374,000	Louisiana, a sister vessel built by contract.
Florida	2,269,000	Utah, a sister vessel built by contract.
Jupiter	590,000	Cyclops, a sister vessel built by contract.
New York	1,463,000	Texas, a sister vessel building by contract.
Cincinnati	770,000	Formal proposals received for their construction.
Raleigh	714,000
Maine	780,000	Limit of cost inside which it is estimated that vessels could have been contracted for.
Texas	449,000
Vestal	250,000	The average of informal estimates received from three shipbuilding companies. (See p. 359, Secretary of the Navy's hearing, Jan. 12, 1911.)
Prometheus	140,000
Total	7,799,000

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Virginia, I desire to state that the battleships New York and Texas were built at the same time. They were sister ships. The New York was built in a Government yard. The Texas was built by the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. Nominally, the Texas cost $1,126,000 less than the battleship New York; but, according to information which I have received, while the expenditure on the New York was nominally $6,956,000, of that amount $1,534,000 represented overhead charges incident to the maintenance of the yard, which should not have been charged against the cost of the construction of that particular ship.

The present bookkeeping system of the Navy Department respecting naval construction is so unfair that the Secretary of the Navy personally requested the committee to give him in this bill authority to revise the system, and so prevent the recurrence of such inaccurate estimates as to the cost of construction of a ship. It will be remembered, however, that the provision went out on a point of order made by the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] yesterday.

The more costly you make it appear for the Government to construct ships in the navy yards the greater latitude the private shipbuilding interests of the country have in imposing extortionate charges upon the Government.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in reply to that statement, I will say that the Government now has authority to charge to the construction of a ship what it thinks ought to be charged, in the way of direct and indirect charges. Its bookkeeping determines what ought and what ought not to go to a particular ship. When, however, we make an appropriation for the maintenance of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, if we build a battleship there it costs more to maintain a yard on account of its being there, in clerical hire and in various ways.

What the department wishes is to be able to take money that is appropriated for the construction of battleships and have power to transfer it, if it sees proper, to maintenance and take it off the construction of the ship; that is, to transfer an appropriation that we make for one purpose to another purpose.

This has been the record of the Government in connection with the constructoin of ships in Government yards and in private yards. The fact, though, that the Government can construct battleships, and ought to have the authority to do it, has been potential in making these shipbuilding concerns charge a great deal less for building ships than they otherwise would.

This question is not between a private yard and a Government yard, if the issue is to be precipitated. The question is whether you are going to wait a year and delay the construction of a battleship a year in order that the Brooklyn Navy Yard may have the privilege of constructing it. That is the only issue here.

If you do not need the battleship; if there is no urgent necessity for it; if there is to be a delay of a year before it shall be available for this country, why appropriate for it this year? The navy yards exist only for the purpose of furnishing ships for the Navy. They have no other purpose in the economy of our Government. Except so far as they may keep ships afloat; except so far as they construct battleships; except so far as they repair battleships; except so far as they can increase the military power of the Government in that respect, they have no use under our system of government. We desire them to answer that purpose. Government navy yards should be created to give cheaper ships and prompter ships. They should not be used as a means to delay the construction of a ship for more than a year.

The Secretary of the Navy asks to have the privilege of constructing the ship either in a navy yard or by private contract, as he sees fit. The Naval Committee of the House concurred in that request. The Naval Committee of the Senate concurred in it. It seems to me there is no reason, either in the saving of money, in the promptness of getting a battleship, or in the necessity for it, why this work should be delayed, as the department says it will be, for a year in the case of the machinery and from four to six months in the case of the hull. I see no reason why the completion of this battleship should be delayed a year in order to permit it to be constructed in the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

So far as work in the Brooklyn Navy Yard is concerned, the Secretary of the Navy says that from the best information he can obtain the ship now under construction there will not be launched before the 15th of July. We always carry at least one battleship in the naval bill. Consequently, when Congress meets in December it will be time to appropriate for another battleship, and then work can be furnished to the Brooklyn Navy Yard. This is what influenced the Secretary of the Navy, the Naval Committee of the House, and the Naval Committee of the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Overman	Thomas
Bryan	Kenyon	Page	Thornton
Burton	Lane	Perkins	Tillman
Catron	Lee, Md.	Poindexter	Vardaman
Chamberlain	Lodge	Pomerene	Walsh
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Reed	Warren
Cummins	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Weeks
Gore	Myers	Smith, Ga.	West
Hitchcock	Norris	Smoot	White
James	O'Gorman	Sutherland	Williams
Johnson	Oliver	Swanson

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD]. He is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. This announcement may continue throughout the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. BRISTOW, Mr. SHAFROTH, and Mr. SMITH of Maryland answered to their names when called.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. HUGHES entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I desire to say a word in reply to some statements made by the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON].

The Senator states that it will involve a year's delay in the construction of one of these battleships if the bill should require that one of the ships should be built in a navy yard. He is clearly in error in that statement. If this bill were passed immediately, several months would be occupied in drafting drawings and plans. A couple of additional months would be occupied in advertising and receiving bids. It is the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy that moving with the greatest celerity the earliest day upon which the construction of battleships could be commenced would be the 1st of November. As I have stated, the Brooklyn Navy Yard, according to the statement made by the commandant of that yard, will have finished the construction of the battleship now being built there by the 15th of January. So, at the outside, it would involve a delay of about two or two and a half months, and the Secretary of the Navy is himself authority for the statement to me that whatever delay would be involved would be purely negligible, and is entitled to no consideration in passing upon the question before us.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I read from the memorandum of the Secretary of the Navy in a letter to the chairman of the House committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am stating now what the Secretary of the Navy stated yesterday morning at the close of a meeting of the Naval Committee in the Capitol.

Mr. SWANSON. In that memorandum he states, if the Senator will permit me, that the delay of the hull will be at least four or possibly six months, and the delay of the machinery will be a year.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I want to say that when the Secretary of the Navy made this statement yesterday he was making it upon the assurance of two experts from his department who were with him.

As I have already stated, the real question involved in this amendment is whether the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., a great shipbuilding trust of the country, is to build these two ships or whether the efficiency of one of our own navy yards is to be maintained at a high standard by having one of the two ships built there. Forty million dollars of the capital of this Government, as I have already stated, is represented in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and unless there is a direct instruction to the Secretary of the Navy that one of these ships shall be built in a Government navy yard—and there is only one Government navy yard capable of constructing a battleship—you may have that valuable plant idle for months after the completion of battleship 39, which is now in course of construction.

Our navy yards, whether they are equipped to build battleships or other vessels, are a part of our national defense. They have to be maintained at a high standard of efficiency. We should have no legislation which may result in the dismemberment of the plant and the disintegration of the force, because if there should be no battleships to be constructed in the Brooklyn Navy Yard after the present one is completed, the force of three or four thousand of the most skilled mechanics in the world who are there now assembled would be dispersed, and as soon as you weaken the efficiency of your own navy yards you extend every latitude to the private shipbuilders of the country.

In my judgment—and I say it respectfully—the choice which is to be made by the Senate on this amendment is whether you want one of these battleships built in your own navy yard or whether you want both of them to be built by a private company.

One word more before I conclude. It has been already suggested that it costs more to build a ship at a Government navy yard than at a private yard; and that claim can be sustained only by relying upon the concededly erroneous methods of bookkeeping that have prevailed in the Navy Department for many years and that the present Secretary of the Navy is so anxious to change. There is a provision requested by the Secretary which was incorporated in this bill and which went out on a point of order yesterday that would have enabled the Secretary of the Navy to have devised methods and plans by which the actual cost of the construction of a ship could be ascertained without imposing upon the ship the overhead charges which represent the cost of maintenance and which represent the expenses which would be incurred by the Government whether it built a battleship or not.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I would like to ask the Senator from New York whether the overhead charges are not legitimately a part of the cost of the ship. Does the Senator for a moment think that private shipyards get along without any overhead charges, or that they do not include such charges in the cost of their ships when they bid for their construction?

Mr. O'GORMAN. As I understand it, the navy yards, whether they are constructing battleships or not, are a source of expense to the Government. There are certain items of expense which run on whether the yard is occupied or not. That is well illustrated in the supposed cost of the battleship New York. It will be remembered that the New York and the Texas are sister ships. The Texas was built by the Newport News Shipbuilding Co.; the New York was built in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. According to some figures which have been published, although the New York was finished five months earlier than the Texas, yet the cost of the New York in the Brooklyn Navy Yard was $1,126,000 in excess of the amount paid for the construction of the Texas; but the fact is that the overhead charges in the Brooklyn Navy Yard amounted to $1,534,000 and were charged against the ship, and if those overhead charges were not put upon the ship the actual net cost in the Brooklyn Navy Yard of constructing the battleship New York would represent something like $408,000 less than the amount paid the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. for the construction of the Texas.

Mr. OLIVER. What I wanted to ascertain from the Senator is this: To properly compare the relative cost of the two ships would you not then have to deduct from the price paid for the Texas to the Newport News Shipbuilding Co. the amount of their overhead charges?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No; because the methods pursued are entirely different. The Newport News Co. is a purely commercial enterprise. It is building ships of different kinds at all times and is incurring expense, I presume, only when it has work which justifies the maintenance of the plant——

Mr. OLIVER. Oh, no.

Mr. O'GORMAN. While our navy yards are a part of our national defense and public interest demands that they shall be kept up to the highest state of possible efficiency.

Mr. OLIVER. I understand that very well; but still the private yards have overhead charges just the same as the United States has, and in the same proportion, and if you deduct the overhead charges of one million or so from the cost of the ship built in the Brooklyn Navy Yard you will have to deduct like charges in the cost of the ship built in the Newport News yard. You can not get away from such a conclusion.

Mr. O'GORMAN. May I ask the Senator whether he would give the building of all our battleships to private corporations if in every instance it could be shown that the private shipbuilding company could build them a little cheaper than it would cost the Government to build its own ships?

Mr. OLIVER. No; not necessarily. I do not want to take that stand; but I do say that if the cost is inordinately greater, as has been our experience heretofore, then I would let them by private contract.

When this question was before the Senate two years ago I offered an amendment providing that if the bid of the private yards was a million dollars less than the estimated cost in a navy yard it should be built by private contract. That amendment was voted down. We have been paying entirely too much in our navy yards for the construction of our battleships. In the case of the Florida it cost over $2,000,000 more than its sister ship, the Utah, and it was by no means as good a job. The United States ship Florida went into commission September 15, 1911. The Utah went into commission August 31, 1911. The Utah was built by private contract at a cost exceeding $2,000,000 less than the Florida. The repairs on the Florida to date have been $151,175.68. The repairs on the Utah have been $95,363.03. Now, it is a simple business proposition, and I would build these ships on business principles; and it is not——

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will say to the Senator that it is purely a business proposition so far as the private building companies are concerned, but with respect to the Government it is more than a business proposition. It is a patriotic proposition. Once dismantle the only shipyard the Government has——

Mr. OLIVER. There is no danger of the Brooklyn yard being dismantled.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I can not yield just now. With the only yard dismantled, with its labor of three or four thousand men dispersed, the Government will have to depend upon the Shipbuilding Trust of this country and accept the prices it will exact for the building of battleships.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it seems to me that both the Senator from New York and the Senate committee are failing to provide for the most vital thing that ought to be provided for, and that is for an additional navy yard in which battleships can be constructed. For us to have in this great country only one navy yard equipped to build a battleship, it seems to me, would be suicidal, almost, in time of war. If we should be so unfortunate as to lose the particular point upon which that one navy yard was situated, it would be almost irreparable during the balance of the war.

I would rather see the provision in the House bill providing that one of the battleships shall be built in a navy yard go out than to see the provision in the House bill which provides for equipping an additional navy yard go out. It seems to me that if we are to build one of the ships in the navy yard we ought at the same time to retain the appropriation for the equipment of an additional navy yard for the construction of battleships, and that if we are not to require the building of one of the battleships in a navy yard, but are to leave it to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, we still ought to make provision for an appropriation whereby at least one more navy yard in this country may be equipped to build battleships.

I agree with what the Senator from New York said, to a very large extent. I do not want to dismantle a great Government navy yard which can construct a battleship, and have it when it is required to do more work to go out and gather up the odds and ends of labor that have been discharged and begin to put itself in a situation where it can again work. I do not want that, but I want at least two navy yards in the country equipped for the building of battleships. It would be better if there were still more of which that could be said.

It seems to me the Senator from New York has made a mistake, and if he were going to offer an amendment he should have offered an amendment in the exact language of the House bill. If it be in order, Mr. President, I shall move as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York the language of the House bill, which is:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip an additional navy yard—

I strike out the word "such" and insert the words "an additional" before "navy yard"— at such place as he may designate, in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built, with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated—

And so forth, in the language of the House bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say merely a word on the committee amendment striking out the provision of the House bill. I think that for the welfare of our Navy we need both the private yards and the navy yards. I think it would be a misfortune not to give enough work to our navy yards to insure the maintenance of the organization and reasonably steady employment for the men at those yards. I think it would be a still greater misfortune if by taking the Government work, which is very important, at the navy yards we should cause the private yards to be diminished or go out of business. I think if building ships became a Government monopoly they would probably be as inferior, as the products of a Government monopoly, as the powder that is made in France, which is a Government monopoly, is considered inferior by every other nation. Therefore I think we want to maintain them both.

No. 39 is being built at the Brooklyn yard at this moment. So that yard has already a battleship on the stocks. It happens to be the only yard where we can build a battleship at the present time.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator means with present dimensions.

Mr. LODGE. With present dimensions.

Mr. TILLMAN. We could build it at Charleston if the dock were big enough.

Mr. LODGE. We can build ships, of course, of smaller tonnage and less length at other yards, but I mean great battleships, such as are authorized here. If this is to be passed at all, and I hope it will not be, we ought to pass it as the House provided, of course. But I think it is a great mistake in policy to compel the Secretary of the Navy without regard to cost to build a ship in a navy yard. He ought to be in a position to make the Government yards compete for this work with the private yards, and force them to keep their prices down. On page 58 of the bill he is given authority to build every ship authorized in the navy yards if he believes that there is any combination or any disposition to charge too much on the part of the private yards. He is given absolute liberty to build them all in the Government yards, and I do not think we ought to tie his hands and put him in a position where he is to say to the Government yards, "I have got to give this to you. It makes no matter how much you spend, how long a time you take, I have got to put this work there." He ought to be in a position to say to them, "If you can not build a ship with reasonable equality of cost and time with the private yards, you will not get the work." By enforcing competition among the yards he has lowered the price very much on other ships, one of which, a transport, has been sent to Philadelphia and a supply ship to the Boston yard, by making them bid against each other and against private yards. That is the position he ought to be in, a position of real strength. I am not against his building battleships in a navy yard. On the contrary, I think it is a good thing to build a proportion of the battleships in a navy yard; but I think it is a very great mistake in policy to tie his hands and put him at the mercy of the Government yards.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is not the Senator aware that a provision similar to the one which is now urged was inserted in the last three or four naval appropriation acts where two battleships were provided for.

Mr. LODGE. I am aware it was inserted, and I think it was a bad provision. I thought so then and I think so still. This House provision is not recommended by the department. It did not come in from the House committee, which is an extremely good committee, with a very able chairman. They did not bring it in. It came in on the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. May I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask the question purely for information. I was rather led to believe that, in the absence of the language proposed by the House, and which is sought to be stricken out by the Senate committee, the implication would be that the Secretary of the Navy must build the battleships in the navy yards. I ask whether that be not well founded. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that it first provides for the construction of two first-class battleships, and then certain torpedo-boat destroyers, and then certain submarines, and then it proceeds:

Three of the coast-defense submarine torpedo boats herein authorized shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided, That the cost of construction on the Pacific coast does not exceed the cost of construction—

Then it proceeds:

The Secretary of the Navy shall build any of the vessels herein authorized in such navy yards as he may designate, should it—should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding the effect, object, or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

That is, provided—

Now, if the Secretary of the Navy should believe that there was no combination among private shipyards that would destroy competition, it seems to me there is here a very clear instruction that he must build these ships in those yards rather than build them in the Government navy yards. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if that is not a fair implication from the bill as it is now presented?

Mr. LODGE. I had read those provisions that the Senator has read to the Senate. The one he has last read has been in the law for a good while. I think myself, as a matter of practice, that the Secretary of the Navy finds no difficulty under that clause in putting any ship in the navy yard that he wants to; but if it is desired to give him still greater latitude, it is easy enough to modify that so as to give him authority to build in a navy yard in his discretion. I am perfectly willing to do that. What I object to is compelling him to build in a navy yard, so that he has no discretion. I want the Secretary of the Navy to have the discretion that will enable him to get the best ship for the United States for the least money.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will the Senator from Massachusetts state how it is possible for the Government to have its ships constructed at a reasonable rate if the only means of controlling, checking, and regulating prices, namely, a well-equipped navy yard, is dismantled, its force expelled and dispersed?

Mr. LODGE. I am sorry I did not have the attention of the Senator. I began by saying that I was thoroughly in favor of maintaining the navy yards and not of dismantling them, of maintaining their organization, of giving them ships to build. I am entirely in favor of that, as I explicitly stated. I think they ought to have a proportion of the battleships to build. I think their plant and organization ought to be maintained. We are building one battleship at Brooklyn at this moment; we are building a supply ship in Boston; and they are building a transport at Philadelphia. I think that is an excellent thing to do.

What I object to, however, is tying the hands of the Secretary of the Navy so that he has no discretion at all. I want him to have the power to use a private yard in competition and to use the Government navy yard in competition by having the discretion which he exercised in regard to the supply ship. He got competing bids from every navy yard and from every private yard in the country, but the Boston Navy Yard happened to be the one that made the lowest bid. It bid below any of the private yards; it made so low a bid that the department thought at first it was impossible for them to do it; they had the figures all gone over; they made some advance; and then their bid was $100,000 below the lowest private bid. So the department sent the order for the ship to be built there. I think that is good; I think it is good for the yards; I think it keeps up the organization of the yards better than anything else; but they have to feel that they have got to compete and that they have to do their very best. If you have a Government navy yard that is sure to get the work, they, knowing the present situation, that there is only one yard that can do the work, of course they do not have the stimulus for bringing out a vessel as quickly and as cheaply as they would if they felt that they would not get another ship unless they built it at a low price.

I do not want to see the Secretary of the Navy tied up. There is a large body of men employed in each of our navy yards. There is one in my State. I am interested in having those men kept employed; and I think to have steady employment, either of repair or of building, is very important for the navy yards, and ought never to be neglected. We have had too much uncertainty about the employment of navy yards, which has had a tendency to debilitate the organization; but it is also well to remember that there are other large bodies of workingmen, skilled mechanics, who are employed in the other great yards, and I think they are entitled to some consideration. They ought to have an opportunity to get at least some of this work. We have private yards from Maine to Norfolk; some of them very large yards. Those yards have been building ships for years. I think it is a great advantage to the country to have them, and I think they are entitled to some consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he does not believe that the bureaucracy or the personnel, or whatever you may call it, in control of one navy yard would really compete with those in control of another navy yard if there were two navy yards that were equipped to build first-class battleships?

Mr. LODGE. There is no question of that, of course.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The esprit du corps in different navy yards would lead them to bring their estimates down to the lowest possible cost, working against one another. Therefore there ought at least to be two navy yards equipped to build these ships.

Mr. LODGE. I entirely agree with the Senator from Mississippi about that. The stimulus which in the last few years has been applied to the navy yards by making them show their construction costs and the time of one navy yard as against another has had a most admirable effect. It was notorious in the old days that the Government yard would take years in building a ship, and that it would cost three or four times as much as it would in a private yard. I refer to the days before the beginning of the construction of the new Navy. They would do what they called "repairing a ship." They would take perhaps one timber of an old ship, retaining its name, perhaps a part of the keel, build a new ship onto it, and call it "repairs." The amount of time and the waste of money when all the work went in that way to the navy yards was deplorable. We have got out of all that; we have got the navy yards competing with each other, and they ought to have their share of the business. I am thoroughly in favor of that. I think it is well to keep up the private yards. What I want is to have the Secretary of the Navy in such position, not that he can not give the construction of ships to the navy yards; I want him to do that; but I do not want to compel him to give the building of ships to the navy yards any more than I want to compel him to give ships for construction to private yards. If it is necessary to modify the clause on the next page so as to give him a larger freedom, I am in favor of doing it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Massachusetts to say in what he describes as "the old days" that any considerable number of ships were then built in Government yards?

Mr. LODGE. Under that system of repairs the first step toward the construction of the new Navy was when Secretary Chandler got through Congress a provision that there should not be more than 20 per cent of the cost of a vessel spent in repairs. That put the old ships out of commission and out of the Navy. The practice had been to take an old, worn-out ship, and, under the head of "repairs," to build a new ship.

Mr. O'GORMAN. My information is that the Government has expended upward of $500,000,000 of public money for ships for the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. Since when?

Mr. O'GORMAN. During its history.

Mr. LODGE. Since the foundation of the Government?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes. Of that amount not to exceed $35,000,000 has been expended through the Government navy yards. Therefore, it appears that, with the exception of this comparatively small amount, until within the last couple of years the private shipyards of the country have had a monopoly of the Government's business in the construction of its ships of war.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the case that I have been stating about the old system of repairing and building a new ship under the name of "repairs," I know from personal knowledge existed. I have seen such cases in the Charlestown Navy Yard. I know that to be so, and it was a bad system. That is what sent the work into the private yards when we came to start in on the construction of the new Navy. The reputation of our navy yards for delay and expense, taking years to build a ship, was so bad that the Government turned to private yards as the only way in which the new Navy could be built up. As time has gone on they have developed the navy yards in the right way, and the navy yards are now getting into a position where they can build ships in as quick time as they can be built in private yards and are being brought very close to the same cost. It is for that very reason that I do not want to tie the Secretary to a hard-and-fast rule. I want him to have the opportunity as much as possible to build ships wherever he can get the best ship in the quickest time, and I think if his hands are free he can do that much better than if he is compelled to build a battleship in a particular yard.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I am in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. This matter presents another angle of the situation that was before the Senate yesterday, when we voted into the bill a proposal to enable, or rather to compel, the Secretary of the Navy, if he expends the money that we intrust to him economically, to have the Government do all of a certain character of work for the United States Navy. For years every naval appropriation bill of which I have any recollection, if passed at a time when it was possible to anticipate the completion of a ship or the launching of a ship from the ways, contained a provision that one battleship of the two provided should be built in a Government yard. This is the first bill in my recollection which has not contained a provision of that sort.

I am in favor, and have been in favor, as I said yesterday, of a certain amount of governmental competition along all these lines.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, the clause of which the Senator speaks is of comparatively recent introduction. If the Senator will look back, he will find that there have been a great many authorizations for naval construction without such a clause.

Mr. HUGHES. I said in recent years; and I am referring to the period covered by my service in the other branch of Congress. I think I can say that for the past 10 or 12 years there has never been a naval appropriation bill passed through the House, when the situation was such that it could be provided that one battleship should be built in a Government yard, which did not contain that language and that direction to the Secretary of the Navy.

We had a lot of trouble with the last Secretary of the Navy in this respect. We had to meet arguments made upon the floor of the House, based upon information furnished by him, which, with all due respect to the gentleman who made the arguments, were absurd. The statement was openly made that each battleship constructed in a Government yard cost between a million and a half and two million dollars more than it would have cost had it been constructed in a private yard. Overhead charges were juggled; and, one instance I remember, when it was boldly asserted that a pump manufactured in a Government yard, which could have been purchased for $200 or $300, cost the Government $1,500. That result was brought about by charging the construction of buildings in various parts of the yard, salaries of officers, and other items of expense that had absolutely nothing to do with the construction of that pump, against that particular piece of work.

A determined effort was made to discredit Government construction of battleships. That effort was met by men just as determined that we should not return to the old system under which private manufacturers held the whip hand over the Government and dictated the prices at which battleships should be constructed and the time of delivery. Whether a ship costs more constructed in a Government yard than in a private yard is a matter of very little consequence to anybody who knows the facts and has an idea of the real difference between the cost of a ship constructed in a private yard and the cost of a ship constructed in a Government yard. The cost does not make very much difference, because it is relatively small; but we do gain in the fact that we compel the private manufacturers to construct our ships for a great deal less comparatively than they constructed them years ago; and we compel them to deliver the ships to us in the same length of time in which they are required to deliver them by other nations for whom they construct battleships. So far as I am concerned, I do not look with favor upon an abandonment of that policy for a single moment.

I want to say to the Senate that my political interests, if they could control me in any way on this question, would cause me to align myself on the other side of it. There is no Government yard in my State; there is no Government yard in which I have any particular interest; there are a few men living in my State who are employed in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, but they are infinitesimal in number and do not make any particular difference to me. On the other hand, one of the biggest private shipyards in the country is located in my State, and they are keen bidders for this class of work and do not think that the Government should go into this business at all. I think it should.

I feel about this proposition very much as I felt about the other. I would not like to see the Government provide sufficient equipment to carry out the entire naval building program each year, thereby discouraging private enterprise, driving private builders engaged in the construction of battleships out of business and leaving the Government dependent entirely upon its own efforts, so that in time of emergency we would not know where to turn. I think the Government should continue and even extend its activities along this particular line. I do not think this bill should be permitted to pass without an instruction to the Secretary of the Navy that one of these ships should be constructed in a Government yard.

The situation in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, which at the present time, in my judgment, is the only navy yard equipped for the construction of battleships of the class provided for in this bill, is such that the Congress can properly and safely direct the Secretary of the Navy to have one of the battleships authorized by the pending measure constructed in some Government yard, and I do not think there is the slightest doubt that it would be constructed in the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

At the time of the laying of the keel of battleship No. 39 the commandant of the yard said that in 10 months she would be off the ways. If that statement is true—and I have no reason to doubt it—there will be a hiatus between the finishing of that ship and the laying down of another, which will cause either one of two things: First, men are not prone to work themselves out of employment; men who see their work coming to an end are likely to "soldier" on the job, as the saying is. That would run up the cost of the maintenance of the yard and the cost of the construction upon which they are already engaged. On the other hand, if the organization of the Brooklyn Navy Yard know that by speeding up their work and by advancing the construction of the ship now building there they will get a chance at a new ship, so that there will be no hiatus between the construction of one and the laying down of another, it will be an incentive to them to give the Government their very best efforts, and it may well be that the fact that this new ship would follow so closely upon the heels of its predecessor would result in an enormous saving to the Government.

Senators constantly say, and have been saying for a great many years, that there is a vast difference between the cost of governmental construction and the cost of private construction. I am glad to know that the Secretary of the Navy is investigating that very question, and when it is investigated and the results of a fair investigation are laid before Congress I am convinced that a great many gentlemen will be surprised by the small difference that will be shown to exist between governmental and private construction. When we arrive at a fair basis of fixing overhead charges, when we have a system that will honestly attempt to place upon each piece of governmental construction the overhead charges which naturally belong on that piece of construction, it will no longer be possible for instances to occur such as the one I referred to a while ago, where it was calmly announced that it had cost the Government $1,500 to build a pump when it could have gone out on the market and purchased the pump at from two to three hundred dollars; it will no longer be possible to construct new buildings at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars at the Brooklyn Navy Yard or any other navy yard, and charge the cost of the new construction up against a battleship that has left the ways.

This proposal of the Senator from New York, in my judgment, is simply a continuation of a policy that was forced upon the last Secretary of the Navy and the last administration. I do not remember that any committee on either side has ever voluntarily put in the bill a proposal that a ship should be constructed at a Government yard. Not only in this case was it put in upon the floor of the House, but in almost every other case, because the Secretaries of the Navy in the past have been unfriendly to governmental construction, and the friends of governmental construction have been the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate.

I do not like to see this policy abandoned. I do not pretend to say that the present Secretary of the Navy is unfriendly to governmental construction; but in so many different ways has it been attempted to favor private shipyards and to discredit, criticize, and blame governmental construction, that I think Congress should write into this bill, in the language that it has written into practically every other bill that I can remember, whenever two ships were to be constructed and it was possible to lay down one of them in a Government yard, that the Secretary of the Navy should continue the policy that we forced upon them in the past.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say just a word about the antiquity of this policy.

This clause appears in the act of 1913. In the act of 1912 it is provided that—

> The Secretary of the Navy may build any or all of the vessels authorized in this act in such navy yards as he may designate, and shall build any of the vessels herein authorized in such navy yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear—

And so forth. He is given full liberty. He is not compelled.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Wait a moment.

In the act of 1911 there is no such provision. In the act of 1910 it is left at his option to build.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, that may very well be.

Mr. LODGE. What I mean is that this clause compelling him to build a ship in a navy yard occurs in just one act before.

Mr. HUGHES. No; the Senator must be mistaken about that.

Mr. LODGE. I am not. I have the acts before me.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator refers to the last two or three acts?

Mr. LODGE. No; it was not in the last two or three acts; it was only in the last act.

Mr. HUGHES. This language never has been put into a bill unless there was a yard which could accommodate a ship; but where Congress has been called upon to pass a bill, and the situation permitted a Government yard taking one of those ships, the language, according to my recollection, has always been put in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's recollection is at fault. The language of which the Senator is speaking, and which is in this bill, occurs, so far as I have been informed, in just one bill, and that is the bill of last year.

I will go back further. In 1909 there is nothing. I can carry it back all the way, if desired.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator does not mean to state, does he, that there was no language in any of these bills providing that the Secretary of the Navy should build certain ships at certain yards?

Mr. LODGE. In just one act is he compelled to do it.

Mr. HUGHES. What act is that?

Mr. LODGE. The act of 1913.

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will go back three or four years he will find language authorizing a ship to be built in a navy yard prior to that language. It would be in the bill only one year in three or four.

Mr. LODGE. I have gone back to 1909. My arithmetic is not good, but that is five years, I think.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator will find, I am sure, although I am depending entirely upon my recollection of what occurred——

Mr. LODGE. I am not speaking from recollection. I am reading the law.

Mr. HUGHES. Very well. I will ask the Senator to go back to an earlier date.

Mr. LODGE. How far back?

Mr. HUGHES. As far back as is necessary to reach a period when a naval bill was passed at a time when it was possible for a ship to be built in a Government yard.

Mr. LODGE. In 1913 we had this compulsory clause, as it is proposed here. In 1912 it was made entirely discretionary; the Secretary "may" build in a navy yard. In 1911 there is no provision at all about it. In the act of 1910 it is provided that the "Secretary may build any or all of the vessels authorized in this act." The language is, "he may." He is given full latitude, and I should like to see it given to him again. In 1909 there is nothing about it. He is not compelled to build in a navy yard.

I do not wish to detain the Senate while I look back in these bills; but this matter of compelling him to build in a navy yard is recent. I am very glad to have it inserted in the large way in which it was put in two of the acts, that he may build in the yards, at his discretion, any or all of the vessels that are designated. I am very glad to have that done.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Under the acts that said he might do it, he did do it, did he not?

Mr. LODGE. Why, certainly he did.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, this amendment has been so thoroughly discussed that I do not feel justified in making any extended remarks in relation to it. I shall, therefore, detain the Senate for only a very few minutes.

This seems to be a question between the people of the United States and the State of New York. There is no other Government yard in the United States equipped to build a battleship except the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The Senator from New York is so jealous of that supremacy that he objects to a little appropriation of $200,000 because he is afraid it might equip some other Government yard to compete for this work.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I am not aware that I objected to the $200,000 feature. That was struck out by the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understood the Senator from New York to say that he only wanted to retain the language, which said:

> One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

The Senator from New York desired to have it stop there. He wanted to omit the balance of that amendment, which appropriated $200,000 for the equipment of a navy yard that might be selected by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia further yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. O'GORMAN. There is a misunderstanding. The House bill contains a provision appropriating $200,000 to equip some navy yard, but that entire House provision regarding the appropriation was struck out of the bill by the Senate committee by amendment. I am now merely seeking to amend the amendment of the Senate committee by restoring at least a part of what they proposed striking out.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, there is no misunderstanding. I understood the Senator from New York perfectly well, and I think every Senator on the floor of this Chamber understood him, as desiring that only a part of what was struck out by the Senate committee should stay struck out. He wished that the part which appropriated $200,000 to equip another yard which might come in competition with the Brooklyn yard should stay stricken out. The Senator said he had no desire to interfere with the action of the committee in striking out that part of the amendment, but he did object to striking out the part which made it compulsory that the Secretary of the Navy should give one of these battleships not to a Government yard, but to the Brooklyn yard. That is all there is in it, for he knows that when it says "a Government yard" it means the Brooklyn yard, unless we make a further appropriation to equip some other Government yard; and he opposed making an appropriation to equip any other Government yard, but insisted on the provision that compelled the Secretary of the Navy, whether it was in the interest of the Government and the people of the United States or not, to build one of these battleships in the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

So I say it is simply a question between the Senator's pet, the Brooklyn Navy Yard, on the one side and the people of the United States on the other. If the opportunities and the advantages of the Brooklyn Navy Yard are so much greater than those of any other Government yard and so much greater than those of private yards, why not let the able Secretary of the Navy determine where he will build these battleships? No human being has asked that the Brooklyn Navy Yard should be excluded. I would not have the Brooklyn yard excluded. I desire the fullest liberty, the amplest power for the Secretary of the Navy, to do that which is for the best interest of the people of the United States. If it is for the best interest of the United States that all of these battleships shall be built at the Brooklyn Navy Yard. I say let them be built at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

There happens to be in my State a Government yard at Norfolk, and there happens to be in my State also a private shipyard, about 20 miles from Norfolk, at Newport News. The Newport News shipyard has in its charter a provision that in case of war or any emergency the Government of the United States can walk in and take possession of the yard, with its entire equipment, use it as it sees fit, and pay little, much, or nothing, as it chooses, for it. It is kept up by private means, but it is always available for the use of the Government. When the Government chooses to walk in and say "I want this yard for Government use" its charter provides that it shall be turned over to the Government. It is a yard large enough to lay down at one time four of the biggest battleships ever constructed. It is equipped and ready now to lay down four of the biggest battleships ever constructed; but, Mr. President, I ask no favors for it. I ask simply fairness. I ask that the work provided for in this bill, about $25,000,000 worth, may be disposed of in the interest of the people of the United States; not in the interest of the Newport News Shipyard; not in the interest of the Norfolk Navy Yard, and certainly not in the interest of this great potentiality—New York—which reaches out and takes in almost everything within reach.

New York was in control of the finances of the United States so long that it brought about a revolution, and we had to have a new banking system to prevent these grasping arms in financial New York from absorbing the utilities of the United States from one end of it to the other. The Democratic Party had enough vitality to protect the country against the too grasping disposition of New York.

I do not wish to speak unkindly or unjustly. New York is a great city, and it has done a great deal; but we know that immense aggregations of wealth always lead to a little too aggressive a spirit and too self-aggrandizing purposes, and we had to protect the financial world from the grasping disposition of this immense potentiality, the city of New York.

I say, therefore, let us not turn over to New York the shipbuilding business. Let us treat the shipyards in New York justly and fairly, but let us not give her a monopoly. If the Government of the United States wants to extend its purpose of constructing ships in Government yards, it is all right, but in making the extension do not let the Senator from New York have his way and prevent every other navy yard from entering into competition with the Brooklyn yard.

I want the Secretary of the Navy to have the largest possible margin of freedom. I want him empowered to protect the people of the United States. I want him to get the best ships, and I will not say necessarily at the lowest price, for conditions may be such, and frequently are such, that I would gladly see him pay more to a Government yard for some of this work than to have the same work done in a private shipyard; but I say let there be a spirit of fairness; let there be a spirit of justice. The people have a right to consideration in this matter—a greater right than New York or Norfolk or Newport News or Philadelphia or Boston. I say let the Secretary of the Navy have the fullest authority, the broadest margin of freedom. Let him be empowered to do that which is best for the people of this country.

You must bear in mind, Mr. President, that there are some considerations besides the mere cheapness of ships. That matter has been discussed by several Senators who have addressed the Senate. It is necessary to keep these Government yards organized; it is necessary to keep them in working order; but how often do we hear it proclaimed from one end of this country to the other that we must do something for our merchant marine? We hear a great deal of talk about helping the merchant marine, but we see very little done. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] can sympathize with that, as he has a bill in which he is trying to do something for the operation of ships when they go to sea; but the first step in looking after a merchant marine is the building of the ships. They cost too much in our home yards, and they always will cost too much unless the yards have enough work to carry on their operations on an economical scale. There is not enough private work done in the American yards to keep them up. It is wise economy on the part of the Government, I say, to give some work to the private yards and some work to the Government yards, so as to keep both of them in operation, so as to keep both classes of yards well organized and well equipped to meet the obligations that rest upon them and to fulfill the demands which the country makes upon them.

The Senator from New York talks about the four or five thousand men that will go out of employment if we do not give the New York yard enough work. I tell him that the ordinary complement of workmen in the Newport News yard is 7,500, and they have recently been compelled to discharge a thousand of them, and propose to discharge two or three thousand more in the next two or three weeks. I say that in order to maintain the shipbuilding industry some liberality is due to the private shipyards of this country. Unless some liberality is shown to them they will go out of business, and then our merchant marine will suffer, and the Government will lose the most powerful agency which it could call on in time of war for the construction of ships of war.

In meeting these different obligations I stand with the committee. The committee has stricken out the amendment that compelled the construction of one of these ships in Brooklyn whether it was for the best interests of the country or not. I say, let it be built at Brooklyn if it is for the best interests of the Government and of the people; and let the Secretary of the Navy, who is as disinterested as anyone can be, and sworn to discharge the obligations of his office, determine whether one or more of them shall be built at Brooklyn and where the others shall be built. I say, leave the matter open as the committee left it.

I say that the amendment reported by the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate is a just and a fair one. It is just to all the yards, Government yards and private yards, when it authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to award this work where he thinks the interests of the Government and of the people will be best subserved.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have been running back as well as I could over these acts. In the act of 1899 there is nothing about building in the yards; in the act of 1900 there is nothing; in the act of 1901 there is nothing; in the act of 1902 there is a compulsory provision like the present one. The act of 1903 follows the form which was used for a series of years, and which I think is a very good one:

> The Secretary of the Navy may build any or all the vessels herein authorized in such navy yard as he may designate.

That gives him full authority to build in the navy yards, and I think that excellent phraseology and a much better system. That is the phraseology of the act of 1904; there is nothing compulsory. In the act of 1905 there is nothing compulsory. In the act of 1906 it is not compulsory. The act of 1907 is not compulsory. The act of 1908 is compulsory. The act of 1909 is not; the act of 1910 is not; the act of 1911 is not; the act of 1912 is not; and the act of 1913 is. There have been four compulsory provisions, and in the rest, since we began to make provision about where we should build the ships, it has been generally that the Secretary of the Navy may build any or all in the navy yards, giving him full liberty, just what I desire him to have.

I said, Mr. President, if we were going to pass this clause at all we ought to provide for equipping another yard or yards, but it should be remembered that the equipment will take some time, and unless the ship is to be greatly delayed it will land in the Brooklyn yard just the same.

Mr. THORNTON obtained the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. THORNTON. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to make a change in the amendment offered by me.

Mr. THORNTON. I rose to make some remarks at what I thought would be the conclusion of the debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the Senator does that I want to read the amendment, because I have made some modification in it, and the Senator may direct his remarks to it as modified. Then I shall sit down.

Mr. THORNTON. Very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment, because since saying that I would offer it I have made some slight changes in it, and I want the Senate to hear it just as it now stands.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read as modified.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes, on page 56, line 20, beginning with the word "One," to strike out the remainder of the paragraph. To that proposed amendment the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] proposes to begin striking out, in line 22, with the word "and." To that amendment the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offers certain changes, so that the paragraph in question will read:

> One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip an additional navy yard in which battleships may be built, with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $400,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi an amendment in the third degree?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am offering the House language.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that, under the last clause of Rule XVIII, "motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence," it comes fairly within the rule. The Senator from Mississippi is seeking to amend the part to be stricken out before the motion is put on striking it out.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then the amendment of the Senator from New York will come later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; and before action on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I can not say that I am able to speak on this question with a mind full of knowledge, because that would not be the truth, but I can say that I can speak on it with a mind absolutely free from prejudice and uninfluenced by any desire save that of conserving the interests of the Government according to my judgment.

As I said in opening the debate on the amendment, I am most heartily in favor of the maintenance of the Government navy yards. I will say here what I have said to outsiders who have approached me on the subject since the bill was reported to the Senate, in the interest of the legislation suggested by the amendment of the Senator from New York, that I am so anxious to see the Government yards maintained and kept in a proper state of efficiency that I would be willing, if necessary, to have battleships built in them at a greater cost to the Government than if built at private shipyards. But I said that I wished the rule of reason to apply there also. I would not feel justified in wishing to see the Government pay an undue excess to Government yards over what they pay to private yards, unless it was absolutely necessary for the maintenance of those yards. I do believe that the Government will be justified in paying something more to Government yards than to private yards, if necessary for their maintenance, but not more than is necessary.

I have said also that every member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate is in favor of maintaining the Government navy yards. I am morally sure of that because of their statements that I have heard.

I said also that I am satisfied the Navy Department of the Government is in favor of maintaining these navy yards, and in proof of that I will read the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, which is the conclusion of the letter addressed by him to the chairman of the House committee, a portion of which has already been read to the Senate by the Senator from Virginia. I quote from the end:

CONCLUSION.

From all of the foregoing it must be evident that—

1. The department desires to encourage shipbuilding in the navy yards.

2. Only the New York yard is at present equipped for building a battleship and can build only one at a time.

3. The Mare Island yard is the only other yard sufficiently developed in shipbuilding to be intrusted with a battleship, but it is not equipped for the work.

4. However, the department hopes that the Congress will see its way clear to leave the question an open one, not restricting it to either private or navy-yard building. If it is decided that one or more battleships must be navy-yard built, funds for the necessary yard equipment must be provided.

Mr. President, I do not think the Senate will make any mistake in acceding to the request of the department in this matter in leaving it an open question for them to decide according to the best interests of the Government. Bear in mind the statement that is made here so unequivocally by the Secretary of the Navy that the department desires to encourage shipbuilding in the navy yards. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the Senator from New York, supplemented as I understand it is by the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, will not be agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I ask for a division of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi so that each proposition may have a separae vote. One, as I understand it, is that we shall build one of these battleships at a Government navy yard and the other is that we shall equip a Government navy yard in addition to the one we now have. There being two propositions in the amendment, I ask for a vote on each, and I do so because I am in favor of constructing one of these ships in a Government yard, but I am not in favor of equipping two yards to build one ship. I think one navy yard that has an equipment for the construction of battleships is all that is necessary for the people of the United States to invest in at the present time. It would seem to me to be a foolishness and extravagance that could not be justified to equip two yards to construct battleships when we build only one annually, and I think we are building too many, anyway.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state for the information of the Senator from Kansas that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi, although it should prevail, would not prevent a vote upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, and that amendment divides the question.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand that; but have I not the right to ask for a division of an amendment where there are two distinct propositions in the amendment? Is it not within the parliamentary rule that a division can be called for upon an amendment of that character?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand what the Senator from Kansas wants to have divided.

Mr. BRISTOW. I want a vote on the provision of the amendment which requires the equipment of an additional navy yard and an appropriation of $400,000 for that purpose, and a vote also upon the proposition that one of these ships shall be constructed in a Government navy yard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That comes clearly under the questions as they are pending. A vote on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi is a vote on the equipment of a new navy yard, and a vote on the amendment of the Senator from New York is a vote simply on the Brooklyn Navy Yard, as a matter of fact.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do I understand the Chair to rule, then, that a vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi is simply a vote on the question as to whether we shall equip an additional navy yard? If that stands alone, and that is the only question involved in the amendment, I can readily vote my sentiments; but if the two propositions are contained I shall have to vote against one thing that I am in favor of, and that is the reason why I think I have a right to ask for a division. If the Chair will hear me a moment further——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I was just going to suggest that the amendment be read, and then the Senator can see just what will be the effect of it. Let it be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. The committee reports in favor of striking out, on page 56, line 20, beginning with the word "One," the following words:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

To that amendment the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] proposes to strike out, beginning with the word "and," on line 22, so that it would leave in the text of the bill the words:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] proposes to so amend the House text, the part proposed to be stricken out, that it will read as follows:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip an additional navy yard in which battleships may be built, with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $400,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there are two distinct propositions in the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi. One is to construct one of these battleships in a Government navy yard and the other is to equip an additional navy yard, and appropriating $400,000 for that purpose.

Mr. JONES. Let me suggest to the Senator that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi does not change the first clause in the House text at all. It leaves it exactly as it is here. The only change he proposes is to provide for the equipment of an additional yard. I would suggest that he leave out the first part and then that proposition will be presented to the Senate.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. OLIVER. I will say there is another slight change, increasing the appropriation from $200,000 to $400,000. But little things like that do not count.

Mr. JONES. That is involved in the proposition to equip another navy yard; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Senator from Kansas will be entirely satisfied with the ruling of the Chair when, if the Chair can express itself clearly, the Chair rules in the first instance that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is in order and not divisible, because it is simply attempting to perfect the text of a portion of the bill to which there is pending a motion of the Senator from New York to strike out a part of the same, and to which there is also pending a motion to strike the entire portion of the bill out by the committee. It is not proper for the Chair to even suggest how to vote; but if we should reach the point when it comes down to a final vote on striking out the clause after it has been amended, if it is amended, then the Senator from Kansas clearly has a right to have the final question divided.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the ruling of the Chair, I think, but in voting for the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi a Senator is required to vote in favor of equipping an additional yard. If he votes against it he votes against constructing one of these ships in a Government yard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. BRISTOW. If he does not do that, then my way is perfectly clear, because I am not in favor of equipping an additional yard. If voting against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi simply means a vote against the equipment of another navy yard, and does not affect the remainder of the bill, of course my vote is very clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is left open on subsequent amendments that are pending for the Senator from Kansas to exercise his judgment as to whether there shall be a ship constructed at the Brooklyn Navy Yard or whether there shall not be.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I will say in reply to what the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] was saying—though the Chair has already covered the ground—that the amendment that we start with is the amendment of the committee to strike out certain words. The first thing in order is to amend and perfect the words which it is proposed to strike out. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] proposes to amend by way of a substitute. If that carries, then the question comes on agreeing to the committee amendment. That has not been disposed of or we could divide the motion if we chose to do so. If that fails, then the question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to restore a part of the clause which the committee propose to strike out. When that is disposed of the question comes on striking out the remainder of the clause.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Mississippi whether the Secretary of the Navy has made an estimate as to the amount of money which will be required to equip an additional yard so that that yard can build a first-class battleship?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will answer that by saying that I do not know. I got the figures "$400,000" by consultation with those whom I presumed did know; and they said that the $200,000 provided by the House bill was not sufficient for the purpose; that it would require $400,000. I therefore inserted those figures. I am not on the Naval Committee, and I do not know what estimate was submitted.

Mr. REED. Can any Senator inform me whether there has ever been an authoritative estimate sent here by the Secretary of the Navy stating that an expenditure of $400,000 will equip another navy yard so that that yard can build a first-class battleship?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know.

Mr. THORNTON. I will answer the Senator by saying no.

Mr. HUGHES. In answer to the question of the Senator from Missouri I will say that my understanding is that we can not equip any yard for $400,000, but that it will cost at least $600,000. I understand that information comes from the Navy Department.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, that disposes of that proposition, so far as I am concerned. I do not propose to blindly vote to appropriate $400,000 or $200,000 or any other amount to equip a navy yard when nobody can tell me whether it will equip a navy yard or whether it will equip two navy yards, and when the best information we have, which comes merely in the form of a suggestion here, is that it will require $600,000. Certainly, we ought not to be entering upon the business of distributing $200,000 and $400,000 in this reckless manner without any estimate, without any knowledge that it will accomplish the work. Surely we ought to wait until at least some naval architect has given us the benefit of an estimate.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. I have made inquiry as to what it would cost to equip the Norfolk Navy Yard to build the largest battleship. As to the building of the slips, I do not suppose it would cost $300,000.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SWANSON. Two hundred or three hundred thousand dollars; but they estimated that to build additional shops, to make every possible change to absolutely equip the Norfolk Navy Yard so that the largest battleship could be built there, would not take over $500,000. I am satisfied $400,000 would equip it to do the work. This means the moving of shops and everything to make the Norfolk Navy Yard really up to date, as I understood, but I am satisfied that $400,000 will equip that yard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in view of the statement that there has been no estimate, and in view of the manifest fact that we are utterly at sea with reference to what it will cost, I make the point of order that the amendment is out of order, because it proposes to appropriate money in the absence of an estimate or recommendation by any department.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the sum of $200,000 was put in the bill by the other House; it is not in the Book of Estimates; but if the Senator from Missouri cares to know about the cost of slips, it is all here in the House hearings, which I now read:

The CHAIRMAN. Building slips, $200,000.

That was what they put in the bill in the other House.

Mr. SWANSON. Will the Senator from Massachusetts permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator will allow me to finish reading this. It continues:

The CHAIRMAN. Building slips, $200,000. Will you explain about that, Admiral?

Admiral STANFORD. This item is for the purpose of constructing building slips or ways to permit of the construction at the yard of the smaller vessels required in the naval service. The slips proposed would have a capacity sufficient for building and launching vessels having a tonnage up to 16,000, and are desired in accordance with the policy of the department.

* * * * * * *

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, what part of the $200,000 goes into the crane and what part into the slips?

Admiral STANFORD. It is estimated that about $173,000 will be required for the supporting construction and foundation work and cranes, of which probably $30,000 to $40,000 will be required for the cranes.

Mr. ROBERTS. Now, let me ask you, Admiral, how much it would cost to put in slips with a suitable crane to build battleships of the largest size?

Admiral STANFORD. Slips sufficient for battleship construction would involved large additional expenditures to provide more conveniently located buildings and equipment which would be required for the heavy construction work.

Mr. ROBERTS. That is, if we are going to build a battleship of the heaviest type, we will have to have some buildings erected near these slips?

Admiral STANFORD. It would probably be found necessary to increase both the building and machine-tool equipment.

Mr. ROBERTS. But that does not just answer my question. What I want to know particularly is how much additional appropriation would be required for slips and a suitable crane and track and power extensions, etc. In other words, what did the building slip in New York cost, with its crane?

Admiral STANFORD. The New York building slip has been extended so many times I do not know offhand just how much it has cost to date. The estimated expenditure on account of the New York slip is between $350,000 and $400,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I insist upon my point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Chair will permit me a minute to read a letter from the department in regard to this matter being estimated for—a letter that has been read. The language is as follows:

If it is decided that one or more battleships must be navy-yard built, funds for the necessary yard equipment must be provided.

That is part of a letter from the department to the effect that if we were going to build one of these battleships in a navy yard the necessary funds must be provided.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator from Virginia think that is an estimate?

Mr. LODGE. That is not an estimate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order. The amendment is out of order. The question now is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask to have the amendment read, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Instead of striking out as proposed by the committee, beginning with the word "one," in line 20, on page 56, it is proposed to begin with the word "and," in line 22, and to strike out the following words:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

So that the portion of the amendment proposed to be stricken out by the committee, reading as follows, will stand in the bill:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I propose to support the amendment offered by the Senator from New York to the committee amendment, without at the present time detaining the Senate by giving my reasons. My purpose in referring to the matter at all is due to the fact that at the appropriate time I desire to offer, and will offer, an amendment to strike out all of the bill beginning on line 13, page 56, and extending from that line down to the last line on page 58. Inasmuch as that motion will include the amendment of the Senator from New York, if that amendment should prevail, I thought it no more than right to call attention to my ultimate purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee. [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask for a division.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee will rise.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I do not understand the question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. What is the question?

Mr. LODGE. As I understand, if I may ask a parliamentary question before we vote, if this vote prevails we strike out the latter part of the portion which the committee recommends to be stricken out. Then the question will recur on striking out the rest of it, and those of us who agree in the view of the committee should vote "yea" on both votes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; and that strikes out the whole thing. This does not carry the amendment of the Senator from New York. This is a perfection of the text which the committee propose to strike out. The Senator from New York proposes to perfect it by striking out the latter part, and then the vote recurs on whether we will strike out the first part.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, the specific amendment which I have offered, and which is submitted to the Senate, will remove any doubt. It consisted of the words:

That so much of the portion struck out by the committee as may be embraced in the words "One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard" shall be retained.

In other words, that the words just read by me—"One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard"—shall be retained in the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. As I understand, the effect of the amendment, therefore, is to affirmatively establish in the bill the first clause which the committee recommends be stricken out.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it ends that part of the question.

Mr. LODGE. I ask the Chair to rule whether, if we strike out this portion, the vote does not then recur on the remaining portion which we have not acted upon?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ruling of the Chair undoubtedly would be that then the question would be put on the amendment as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Exactly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the vote were "yea," the Brooklyn Navy Yard would go out, and if it were "nay" the Brooklyn Navy Yard would stay in.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do not fully understand that, Mr. President. The Senate committee proposes an amendment striking out certain language on page 56, and I propose an amendment to that of the Senate committee providing for the retention of the words I have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But there is no such motion known to parliamentary law as the retention of part of a motion to strike out.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York, if he will permit me, moves to perfect the part which the committee recommends be stricken out. He proposes to perfect it by striking out the latter part. If that carries, there still remain those three lines compelling the Secretary to build one ship in a navy yard, after which the question comes whether the amendment proposed by the committee to strike out the rest of it shall prevail.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is satisfactory.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has the same effect exactly. Those in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee will rise. [A pause.] Those opposed will rise. [A pause.] The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to. The question now recurs on the amendment of the committee, as amended, to strike out certain language, and, in order that there may be no doubt, the Secretary will state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 56, line 20, beginning with the word "One," strike out the following:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; that has gone.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has gone.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to avoid any misunderstanding, a vote "yea" on this amendment now is to remove from the bill entirely the provision about building one of the battleships in a Government yard. Those who desire a battleship built in a Government yard will vote "nay" on the pending motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It will leave it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No.

Mr. LODGE. He is given discretion later on in the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment. [Putting the question.] By the sound, the noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask for a division.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not think the question could have been understood. I did not understand it. I understand that a vote "aye" is a vote to strike out the clause compelling the Secretary to build one of the battleships in a Government yard. I ask the Chair to put that question. If not, I will call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, is it not in order to ask the Secretary to state what the amendment is before the roll is called?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have it stated for the purpose of the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

Mr. HUGHES. A parliamentary inquiry. A vote in the affirmative is a vote to strike out the language directing the Secretary of the Navy to have a battleship built in a Government yard?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly; and the Secretary is about to state the amendment.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I can tell how to vote if I can hear the amendment stated.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes to strike out the following words on page 56, line 20, beginning with the word "One":

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I understand, a vote "yea" upon the proposition before the Senate, if it prevails, leaves it discretionary with the Secretary of the Navy to build this battleship where he thinks best, and a vote "nay" compels him to build one of them in the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not going to construe the bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I know Senators desire to vote, and I am not going to take more than a minute of time to say that I believe the Secretary of the Navy, if he is given the discretion, would construct one of the two battleships authorized in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, as that is the only Government navy yard where it could be constructed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Provided, if the Senator will pardon me, that he shall not find that the present construction going on there would delay him too long.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, Mr. President, I do not propose, so far as my vote is concerned, to leave it to anybody's discretion. I am in favor of building this battleship, if it is to be built at all, in a Government navy yard. I am certain, if built in a Government yard, it will be better built than if built in any private navy yard; and I am certain, Mr. President, if the Government navy yard is given an even chance with the private navy yard, it will be built cheaper in the Government navy yard.

We have had one or two, and only one or two, tests, as nearly as I can ascertain. From such inquiry as I could make here on the floor of the Senate we have built but three battleships in the Government navy yards. I may be wrong about that. One of those the Secretary of the Navy was compelled to build there because the language of the appropriation bill required him to do so. There were two battleships, sister ships, turned out in 1905. They were alike. As I understand, they were built on the same plans. One was built in a private yard and the other in a Government yard. The one built in the Government yard cost something like $300,000 more than the other to build. The excess of cost of that vessel was due to the fact that it was to be used as a flagship, and to the further fact that considerable expense was incurred by delay in the delivery of armor plates. Eliminating the additional cost chargeable to these two items, the difference in cost as against the Government-constructed ship was $29,855. But the history of those two battleships for the next three or four years, which I have been able to trace in the few minutes this debate has been on, is very interesting.

During 1906, the first year those two ships, built on exactly the same model, were in use, the cost for repairs on the one built in the Government navy yard, the Connecticut, was $236.97. The cost of repairs on the Louisiana, the sister ship, built in a private yard, was $5,851.09.

In the second year the cost for the Connecticut was $53,557.94. The cost for the Louisiana was $99,851.09.

The third year the difference in the upkeep of these two vessels was as follows: On the Government-built vessel it was $111,833 and some cents. On the vessel constructed in the private yard it was $149,167.

I have not been able to run it down any further in the little time I have had, but the difference in the cost of upkeep between the Government-constructed vessel and the vessel constructed in a private yard for those three years was 33 per cent in favor of the Government-constructed vessel.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask the Senator if there was any difference in the use of these vessels? That might have had a good deal to do with it, especially in reference to the machinery.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There may have been something in that; but I take it that where you see this difference in the cost of upkeep running right along, year after year, in favor of the Government-built ship, as far as I have traced the history of them, it indicates that better work is done where the work is performed by the Government, and there is no gouging on the part of any party privately interested.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Pardon me for a few minutes.

Whenever a battleship is constructed in a private yard it is necessary for the Government to install watchers—inspectors—to maintain a sort of espionage over the work in all its details in order to insure honest work. It is well known you can not have the sort of supervision which will provide against every element of dishonesty that a contractor who considers only his private gain is impelled to impose upon one for whom he performs a contract. With the Government, under the improved systems and the high efficiency being wrought into all Government work, there is no inclination or reason for anybody defrauding or cheating on the work or using inferior material.

While I have voted ever since I have been in the Senate for one battleship instead of two, I nevertheless favored the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and should have voted for it if it had been submitted to the Senate. I believe, if adopted, it would introduce into this Government work the element that is always desirable—that of competition; that of strife between two organizations, each seeking to make the best record—and that would prove a great incentive to still higher efficiency in the Government yards.

In so far as this work of building battleships is to go on, I should like to see it done by the Government. I believe we would have better work, and I believe we would eliminate a strong, powerful influence that makes for international disturbance, and that was referred to so eloquently and so brilliantly by the Senator from Mississippi the other day. I refer to this world-wide organization that is stimulating and fomenting discord in order that it may make profit out of the furnishing of munitions of war of every sort and kind. In so far as this Government is to make preparation against the dire evil of war, I want to see it done solely under Government supervision and at Government expense.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. I simply wish to make one statement.

The Senator made a mistake about the Connecticut and the Louisiana. I have here a letter from Admiral Watt, the Chief Constructor of the United States Navy, in response to a letter from Mr. JONES. Admiral Watt's letter is dated April 1, 1914, and in it he gives the expense of each of these two ships from 1906 to the 1st of March, 1914. He states that there has been spent on the Connecticut $917,610.06 and that there has been spent on the Louisiana $885,915.75. That is up to the 1st of March, 1914.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, that simply carries the history of these two vessels some four or five years later than the data which I had before me, which were for the first three years. For those years I am very certain that the data were accurate, because they were taken from the report.

Mr. SWANSON. In the year 1907, which was the year immediately afterwards, there was spent on the Connecticut, he states, $54,960.20.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My figures are $53,557.94.

Mr. SWANSON. On the Louisiana, $105,404.49.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My figures are $99,851.

Mr. SWANSON. In 1908—this is signed by him—there was spent on the Connecticut, the Government-built ship, $140,482.70, and on the Louisiana $66,691.43.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am very much surprised at those figures, because I am very certain they are not in agreement with the figures that appear in the previous report, from which the figures I quoted were taken.

Mr. SWANSON. This is a letter from Admiral Watt, the Chief Constructor of the Navy.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not care if it is a letter from him; I took these figures myself from the report. I did not have the figures for the latter period, and I believe the figures of the report for the three years covered by the report should be accepted as authoritative.

Mr. SWANSON. This is in response to a letter asking the amount spent each year on these ships.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. President, the immediate question before the Senate seems to me to be a parliamentary question as to the effect of a vote. As I understand, a successful affirmative vote means to leave with the Secretary of the Navy the discretion of determining where he will contract to build these ships. A successful negative vote means to require him to build one of these ships in a Government navy yard. Am I correct about that?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already stated that the Chair would not pretend to decide what the bill means. The effect of a successful affirmative vote would be to strike out the provision that one ship shall be built at a Government navy yard; but whether or not that leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to build it at a Government navy yard is for the bill itself to say and not for the Chair.

Mr. WHITE. Then, Mr. President, will a successful affirmative vote defeat the amendment of the Senator from New York?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New York has already been agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. No; this is the yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

Mr. WHITE. This is the yea-and-nay vote called for on that proposition, as I understand.

Mr. LODGE. A yea-and-nay vote has been ordered, but it has not yet been taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not on the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. LODGE. It is on the amendment of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A successful affirmative vote simply means that the provision that one ship shall be constructed at a navy yard goes out of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. The amendment of the Senator from New York has already been carried, as I understand.

Mr. LODGE. The amendment of the Senator from New York has been carried, and now the question recurs on the amendment of the committee to strike out the words. If the vote is "yea," the words which the Senator from New York wants retained go out of the bill.

Mr. WHITE. That is all right, if that is the ruling of the Chair. I simply wanted to know about it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. To remove any possible doubt, if I can have the attention of the Chair——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. A "nay" vote on the pending motion will have the effect of retaining in the bill the provision for which I have been contending.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. President, I simply want to put in the RECORD again, in connection with what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has been saying, the comparative figures to which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] has already called attention.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. From what is the Senator about to read?

Mr. LODGE. This is from the official report of the Navy Department. It is taken from the Government report. I shall not read the details, but simply the totals.

The total cost of the U. S. S. Florida, built by the United States Government, was $6,295,137.05. The cost of the Utah, the sister ship, was $4,145,228.34. The Florida, the Government-built ship, went into commission September 11, 1911, and the repairs to March 1, 1914, were $151,175.68. The U. S. S. Utah, built in a private yard, went into commission August 31, 1911, only 15 days earlier, and the repairs to date on that ship were $95,363.03.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, what did the Senator from Massachusetts say was the difference in the cost?

Mr. LODGE. I shall have to figure it out. It is $2,150,000.

Mr. WEST. They were sister ships?

Mr. LODGE. Sister ships; yes. That is exclusive of armor and armament.

Mr. WEST. And the Government-constructed vessel exceeded the other in cost by $2,150,000?

Mr. LODGE. Those are the figures from the Navy Department.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Chair very wisely, I think, declined to construe or interpret this bill with regard to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. From my point of view, it is as full of doubt in that respect as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I do not believe it gives fairly and fully discretion to the Secretary of the Navy to build a ship in a Government navy yard, even though the amendment now pending is adopted, if these words are stricken out. I suggested that to the Senator from Massachusetts when he was on his feet a few moments ago, and he said it could be easily changed so that the true intent would appear; but it has not been so changed.

Mr. LODGE. We can not change it until we reach it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I now desire to call the attention of the Senator to just what the bill does in that respect. The provision on this subject begins:

> That for the purpose of further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States, the President is hereby authorized to have constructed two first-class battleships carrying as heavy armor and as powerful armament as any vessel of their class, to have the highest practicable speed and greatest desirable radius of action, and to cost, exclusive of armor and armament, not to exceed $7,800,000 each.

There the bill will end, so far as battleships are concerned, if the amendment of the committee as amended is permitted to remain in the bill.

It then proceeds to mention certain other naval craft which are also authorized to be built, and then says:

> Three of the coast-defense submarine torpedo boats herein authorized shall be built on the Pacific coast: Provided—

I shall not read the proviso; but it is provided that they shall be built there if they can be built as cheaply as they can upon the Atlantic coast.

Now, mark this language:

> The Secretary of the Navy shall build any of the vessels—

That item includes the two battleships—

> herein authorized in such navy yards as he may designate, should it reasonably appear that the persons, firms, or corporations, or the agents thereof, bidding for the construction of any of said vessels have entered into any combination, agreement, or understanding the effect or purpose of which is to deprive the Government of fair, open, and unrestricted competition in letting contracts for the construction of any of said vessels.

That may be interpreted to mean that the Secretary of the Navy shall build these vessels in the navy yards if he finds that this combination exists, or it may mean that he can only build the vessels in these navy yards if he finds that the combination exists. But that is not the principal difficulty about the bill. On page 60 we find a provision which I will read:

> Of each of the sums appropriated by this act, except such amounts as may be required to meet obligations authorized in previous acts and for which contracts have been made, no part shall be used to procure through purchase or contract any vessels, armament, articles, or materials which the navy yards, gun factories, or other industrial plants operated by the Navy Department are equipped to supply, unless such Government plants are operated approximately at their full capacity for not less than one regular shift each working day, except when contract costs are less than costs in said Government plants, and except when said Government plants are unable to complete the work within the time required, and except in cases of emergency.

That means, and there can be no other fair inference drawn from it, that if the Secretary of the Navy receives a bid for the building of these battleships which is less than the cost which he computes or estimates as the cost of building the ship in the Government navy yard, he must accept such bid and exclude the Government navy yard from the work.

I am one of those who believe that the construction of a battleship in a Government navy yard is more important than any reasonable difference between the cost of constructing it there and the cost of constructing it in a private yard. But, however that may be, we are not prepared to compare the cost of constructing it in the navy yards with the cost of doing it in the private establishment until we change the law with regard to the bookkeeping of the Navy Department. The Secretary of the Navy has so declared to the Committee on Naval Affairs. He has said that in estimating the cost of building a ship in the Government yard he is required by the law to charge to the construction of that ship many items of expenditure which ought not to be charged to the ship, and he says, as I understand it, at least I read that from a very reputable source, that the battleship New York was really built for $500,000 less than the battleship Texas, although, according to the books of the Navy Department as compared with the books of the private shipbuilder, it apparently cost $1,500,000 more.

I am not willing, therefore, to have it said here that a vote to sustain the committee's amendment as amended is a vote to give to the Secretary of the Navy unqualified, full discretion whether to build his ship in the Government navy yard or not, for I do not think the law as proposed can be so construed. I would not be in favor of giving him that discretion, even though the bill did so specifically provide, for I think the policy of building one of these ships in a Government navy yard is a policy that ought to be declared by Congress, and that the discretion to depart from it ought not to be vested in any governmental officer, however fair and however patriotic and however competent he may be.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. The language the Senator has called to the attention of the Senate, saying it would not leave any discretion to the Secretary of the Navy, is precisely the same language that was in the act last year, under which the Secretary of the Navy has given to the navy yard at Philadelphia the building of a transport and the building of a supply ship to the Boston Navy Yard. The language has always been construed as leaving an absolute discretion in the Navy Department. It is the same language used in the appropriation act of last year, under which the discretion has been exercised.

Mr. CUMMINS. That may be. I do not know what the bids upon the ship built in the Philadelphia Navy Yard were; I do not know what the costs were. I do not know the proposed cost by the private builder as compared with the estimated cost by the Government; but I say, no matter what has been done, if the Secretary of the Navy finds a bid for this ship for a less sum than he can construct the ship in a Government navy yard, according to the methods of bookkeeping now prevailing there, he will be obliged as an honest, competent, and faithful official to award the contract to the private shipyard, and not build it in the Government yard.

Mr. SWANSON. I simply want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this language has been carried, as I understand it, in repeated naval appropriation acts and it has had the construction of the department. Under that construction it has always been held that it left a discretion with the department to build in private yards or in Government yards. The language, I understand, has not been changed, because it is the language carried from year to year.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know, for I have not examined it. I only know when the bids come in, if the bids are lower than the estimated cost by the Government, the Secretary of the Navy can not feel that he has that full discretion which those who are proposing to adopt the amendment of the committee would like to give him.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. The practice of the department and the interpretation of the law is exactly as the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has described it. But if there is any possible doubt it is very easy, when we reach that point in the bill, to insert, after the words "Secretary of the Navy," in the eighteenth line, the language which has been used in 8 or 10 recent acts:

> The Secretary of the Navy may build any or all the vessels authorized in this act in such navy yards as he may designate.

There can be no question about it if that language is put in.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the bottom of page 58, where I insert a comma in place of the period and add these words:

> Or if for any other reason the Secretary of the Navy shall deem it in the public interest to construct one or both in a Government navy yard.

That would cure the entire trouble.

Mr. LODGE. It would cure it just as my amendment would cure it. I adopted the language of the old law. Either one would cure it, but we can not cure it until we get to it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Undoubtedly it can be cured; and I am very much obliged to both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Mississippi for pointing out the way in which it can be cured.

I rose largely for the purpose of indicating that the vote did not mean precisely what it was asserted in some quarters that it meant. So far as I am concerned, it would make no difference with my vote. I am in favor of building one of these ships in a Government navy yard, and I believe that to do otherwise would be to overturn the very highest public policy, not only for the reasons stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] but because it is essential that the Government shall retain all the while the capacity to build its own battleships. To allow that great organization in the Brooklyn Navy Yard to disintegrate—that great plant which has been accumulated with such infinite care and great genius, I may say, in order that the ship may be built in some private yard—to me is contrary to the best and highest interests of the United States. I intend to vote in such a way as will retain the Brooklyn Navy Yard in full efficiency, and if it be the only navy yard capable of building a ship of the character here described, that the ship shall be built there and under Government supervision and at Government expense.

Mr. WEST. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa a question before he takes his seat. Why is it that the Government is unable to adopt some system of bookkeeping whereby it would be able to arrive at the real cost of these battleships, so that there could be some comparison made?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that myself, but I will read to the Senator from Georgia an extract from the statement of the Secretary of the Navy:

> All the cost figures sent to Congress by myself and other Secretaries of the Navy concerning the cost of navy-yard construction of battleships do not show the truth. At the request of the House Naval Affairs Committee I recently sent Chairman PADGETT figures purporting to show the cost price of the battleship New York, built in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. Those figures contained items which should not properly have been charged against the ship. There was nothing else for me to do, however, but to put them in. If the law is changed, then I will be able to use my own discretion as to what overhead charges should be assessed against ships built at our yards.

Continuing, he says:

> Navy yards have a twofold purpose. In time of war they should be used entirely for making repairs to ships.

I am not sure that this is an extract from the Secretary's testimony. It may be the editorial in the Brooklyn Eagle from which I am quoting:

> In time of peace they can very well be employed in constructing battleships. Those improvements made at the yards while a ship is under way that are of a permanent nature should not be assessed against the ship. They should be charged to some other appropriation. Now they are charges to the price of the ship, and it is not right. For instance, a pump at the Brooklyn yard furnishing water for use by the men working on the New York broke while the ship was under way. A new one was installed in its place. The cost of this work was charged against the New York. This was not right, but we could do nothing else under the present law. If the Senate amendment were part of the law now, this item would not have been included in the final cost price of the ship.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ASHURST responded "nay."

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Too late.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I was on my feet before——

SEVERAL SENATORS. The roll call has begun.

Mr. WHITE (when Mr. BANKHEAD's name was called). I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. BANKHEAD] is paired with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF].

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND], who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I do not know how he would vote, and I withhold my vote for the present.

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KENYON (when Mr. JONES's name was called). I wish to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] is paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. I am informed that if the senior Senator from New York were here he would vote upon this amendment as I would vote, and I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. WALSH (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT]. Not knowing how he would vote I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I wish to transfer the pair I have with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. SHIVELY]. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED (after having voted in the negative). I inadvertently voted, but I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] who is temporarily absent from the Chamber. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. POINDEXTER (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay," and I wish to state in personal explanation of it my understanding of the parliamentary situation. The question upon which we are now voting is upon the amendment of the committee as it was amended by the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN]. So the question upon which we are voting is an amendment proposed by the committee to strike out of the bill the words after the semicolon, in line 22:

> And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment; and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

I am in favor of retaining that in the bill. The amendment proposed is to strike it out. Consequently I voted "nay" upon the amendment. The amendment of the Senator from New York is not involved in this question at all, because that amendment has already been adopted. The amendment of the committee was amended by a vote of the Senate by agreeing to retain that language in the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the point of order that debate is not in order in the midst of a roll call.

Mr. WILLIAMS. A roll call can not be interrupted.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am making a personal explanation. I have said practically all that I desire to say except——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I make the point of order, and I should like a ruling by the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order must be sustained.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I ask leave to print, if the Senator will allow me to do that.

Mr. OLIVER. I object to any leave to print, Mr. President.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator can make his explanation afterwards.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is unavoidably detained. If he were here, he would vote "nay."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the following Senators: The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]; the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]; the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who is paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]; the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA], who is paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD]; the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], who is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]; the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]; and the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], who is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. WALSH. I have heretofore announced my pair, but I transfer it to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 16, nays 30, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. HUGHES. I move a call of the absentees.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under the rule, as I understand it, unless a sufficient number of Senators vote, and thereby give the Senate a quorum, it is required that the roll of the entire Senate be called, so as to ascertain whether or not there is a quorum present.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask for a call of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, June 1, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 29, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m., and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HAY.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, for a united country, strong in its material, intellectual, moral, and spiritual resources, and our hearts go out in grateful memory to the true, the noble, brave, patriotic men who sacrificed even unto death, that it might live. Keep us, we beseech Thee, close to Thee, that we enter not into temptation and misuse the precious gifts with which Thou hast so abundantly blessed us, but lead Thou us on to still greater heights of glory, an example to the world of righteousness, truth, and justice, "with malice toward none and charity for all." Peace reigning o'er us, one country, one flag, one God and Father of us all. And Thine be the praise forever. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

APPROVAL OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal as read will stand approved.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understood the Journal as read to say that the House disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the Agricultural appropriation bill. As a matter of fact, that was not the motion, although it should have been; and, as a matter of fact, as I am informed, that was not the message which was sent by the House to the Senate. The fact is that the Senate adopted amendments to the Agricultural appropriation bill, and without insisting upon its amendments, asked for a conference, and the House, without disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate, agreed to the conference, so that there was no disagreement between the two Houses, and the point had not been reached where it was proper to have a conference. The Journal does not agree with the message which was sent to the Senate. I call attention to it, because I think Members who present these matters to the House ought to do it in a correct manner, so as not to get everybody tied up.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman's proposition is that the House ought to have disagreed to the Senate amendments and to have agreed to the conference?

Mr. MANN. Each House before it asks for a conference either disagrees or insists upon its own amendments.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. And in this case the Senate did not insist upon its amendments, and the House did not disagree to the Senate amendments.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, it was suggested to the gentleman from South Carolina that the motion he put was not a proper motion, and he insisted upon it.

Mr. MANN. I could not hear the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] when he made the motion, or during the conversation which he had with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER].

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think the Journal ought to show a disagreement to these amendments in some way?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think the Journal now states a disagreement, but the message which was sent to the Senate yesterday by the House did not state that the House had disagreed to the Senate amendments, because the message was in conformity with the motion made in the House yesterday.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that I asked the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, whether or not his request was to disagree to the Senate amendments and he said that it was not.

Mr. MANN. I understand, and there is no occasion for a conference until there is a disagreement between the two Houses.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. I thought myself that that ought to have been the request, to disagree to the Senate amendments and to agree to the conference.

Mr. MANN. It should have been.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I recall, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] suggested that to the gentleman from South Carolina at the time he made his motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks the statement of the gentleman from Illinois is correct, and, without objection, the Journal will be corrected.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have no objection to whether it is corrected or not, but I think there ought to be a disagreement.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the RECORD be corrected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the RECORD will be corrected. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, if the Journal is corrected to show no disagreement was had in the House as to the Senate amendments, and that part of the Journal is vacated, would it not be necessary to now disagree to the Senate amendments and to ask for a conference?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that in effect the Senate amendments have been disagreed to.

Mr. MANN. The papers are gone beyond the possession of the House in any event.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And it is now beyond the power of the House.

The Journal was approved.

THE PAGES.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, by unanimous consent the House has agreed that when it adjourns to-night it will adjourn over to-morrow, which is Decoration Day, until Monday. I understand that, regardless of this fact, the pages on the floor of the House and the telephone pages are required to remain here upon the floor to-morrow from 10 o'clock until 2. There will be nobody here, and I see no necessity for requiring these boys to remain here to-morrow, when there will be nothing for them to do. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that they may not be required to be present to-morrow, in order that they may have the day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the pages on the floor of the House and the telephone pages may not be required to attend to-morrow from 10 o'clock until 2. Is there objection?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

DECORATION DAY.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the subject of Decoration Day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes on the subject of Decoration Day. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman permit me to first dispose of a formal matter which is before the House?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Yes; certainly.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if he will not take 10 minutes?

Mr. RUCKER. Without wanting to displace the gentleman, I would like to call up the conference report——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That would have to be done also by unanimous consent.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, it is privileged, is it not?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not under the present rule.

Mr. RUCKER. I think on yesterday the Speaker ruled it was privileged when the present occupant of the chair was not presiding.

Mr. GARNER. The Speaker held that a conference report was in the discretion of the Chair whether he could call it up under this rule.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker held this conference report was in order under the rule.

Mr. GARNER. That this conference report was in order under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will call attention to the rule:

> The order of business provided by this resolution shall be the continuing order of business of the House until concluded, except that it shall not interfere with Calendar Wednesday, nor with the consideration of House bill 16508, the further urgent deficiency bill, nor with the consideration of conference reports on appropriation bills or the sending of appropriation bills to conference.

Now, the Chair understands the bill called up by the gentleman from Missouri is not an appropriation bill.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] at the time that rule was under consideration made an inquiry of the Speaker with reference to conference reports.

Mr. MANN. In reference to matters on the Speaker's table.

Mr. GARNER. In reference to matters on the Speaker's table, and the Speaker then said that in construing that rule that he would hold it was within the discretion to call up matters on the table, so it is entirely with the Chair——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Of course the present occupant of the Chair was not conversant——

Mr. MANN. But the Speaker on yesterday, when this conference report was called up, or rather when the same bill was called up, held it was in order to be called up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Very well.

Mr. RUCKER. I will read what the Speaker said if the Chair desires.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. For 10 minutes, as I have been asked to limit my time to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to indulge in any criticisms of the administration?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I simply desire to speak on the subject of Decoration Day.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Men can talk on a great many things under such a title.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman so tender about the administration?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not tender about it.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. It is too broad a field to go into.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But I do not propose to permit indiscriminate criticism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon the statement of the gentleman I do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I am very appreciative of the indulgence of the House at this time. I had intended to speak to-morrow, but in honor of the veteran soldiers of our country the House will adjourn over to-morrow, and I now thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak to-day.

The 30th day of May is set apart to commemorate the great achievements of the Grand Army of the Republic in the War of the Rebellion and all soldiers and sailors in fighting the battles of our country and preserving the Union.

On this day will assemble in every part of our land, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, in the Northland and in the Southland, millions who will pay homage to the Nation's dead, and in loving remembrance place flowers upon the silent tombs of those who fell in battle and of those who offered their lives for their country who have since died and have been given a final resting place in the city of the dead.

In that memorable war, the greatest of all times, were engaged the largest armies known to authentic war history. In this war the conflict was the fiercest; the deeds of daring and bravery the most exemplary; the victories the most brilliant; and the achievements by armies more beneficial to all mankind than in any prior conflict, and time will never efface the splendor and glory of the valor of those brave men.

Time will not permit me to recount the deeds of daring and bravery of those illustrious men who sacrificed their lives in that great conflict, nor of those who offered their lives in defense of their country; that will be told upon the plains and hillsides by millions who will this day recount the stirring scenes of battle and the glories of their achievements; and around the hearthstones of many homes made sad and solemn by the absence of those who went forth at the call to arms and who never returned will be recounted the sacrifices made, and to many will recur the blighting remembrance of the last farewell.

Mr. Speaker, it is not alone to the dead that we owe a debt of gratitude, but also to all those yet living who in the flower of their young manhood offered their lives in the defense of their country. Neither do we neglect the loving wives and mothers who parted with their dearest treasure and who so uncomplainingly have gone through life in hallowed sorrow. To them all this country owes a debt of admiration and respect which no recompense can efface; to them do we, who to-day enjoy the benefits and share in the glory of their victories, acknowledge our gratitude. To them all time will garnish the pages of our national record and gild our history with the luster of their sacrifices. To the living and the dead, to those who fill the known and the unknown graves, to all who took the solemn vow that he would die if need be in freedom's name, we devoutly and reverently acknowledge that their glory ends not with the grave, but all future generations will do them homage.

We love to read of Bunker Hill, Yorktown, Lexington, Valley Forge, and of those times that tried men's souls. We learn how Washington and Lafayette and Greene and Wayne, with a half-paid, half-fed, and half-clothed army won our independence. And still we deprecate war. What position would we be in to-day for peaceful arbitration with England concerning our independence and free Government and our individual right to worship according to our own conscience? And where would be our boasted liberty if it had not been for the War of the Revolution? Was it worth the sacrifice? Yes, a thousand times. For out of the requiem of the Battle of Bunker Hill and the melody of the Star-Spangled Banner millions of lives to-day, and untold millions to follow us, enjoy such liberty of thought, action, and pursuit that is the wonder and admiration of the world and makes for equal opportunity.

We deprecate war. But without war we would be to-day a disrupted and a divided nation. Were it not for the War of the Rebellion each State might now claim the right to secede, and instead of us being one nation of 48 States which now constitutes the Union, we might be 48 independent nations. That was severe warfare, and the resources of the Nation in men and treasure were taxed severely to preserve it.

Under Lincoln, Sherman, Sheridan, Farragut, and Grant, and such a splendid galaxy of military chieftains, leading an army of such fighting men as the world never knew, the task of not establishing but restoring the Union was again accomplished. Was it worth it? We say it was.

Then, again, when murder, plunder, and barbarism stalked in Cuba, and our brave boys lost their lives in the Maine, it was McKinley and Dewey, the blue and the gray, Rough Riders, Joe Wheeler, and Schley, in answer to the call, who drove Spanish tyranny and power from that fair land. The War with Spain received the plaudits of the world, and Cuba, with its 2,250,000 freemen, tell of the result.

Mr. Speaker, at the close of the Thirty-eighth Congress of the United States, from your desk, Speaker Colfax took occasion to felicitate the House and the country on the achievements of our men in arms, and among other things said:

> But in this hour of gladness I can not forget the obligations, paramount and undying, we owe to our heroic defenders on every battle field upon the land and every wave-rocked monitor and frigate upon the sea. Inspired by the sublimest spirit of self-sacrifice, they have realized a millionfold the historic fable of Curtius as they have offered to close up, with their own bodies if need be, the yawning chasm that imperiled the Republic. For you and me and for their country they have turned their backs on the delights of home and severed the tenderest of ties to brave death in a thousand forms; to confront with unblanched cheek the tempest of shot and shell and flame; to storm frowning batteries and bristling intrenchments; to bleed, to suffer, and to die. As we look from this Capitol Hill over the Nation there are crushed and broken hearts in every hamlet; there are wounded soldiers, mangled with rebel bullets, in every hospital; there are patriot graves in every churchyard; there are bleaching bones on every battle field. It is the lofty and unfaltering heroism of the honored living, and the even more honored dead, that has taken us from every valley of disaster and defeat and placed our feet on the sun-crowned heights of victory. The granite shaft may commemorate their deeds. Our American Valhalla may be crowded with the statues of our heroes, but our debt of gratitude to them can never be paid while time shall last and the history of a rescued Nation shall endure.
> If my voice, from this Representative Hall, could be heard throughout the land, I would adjure all who love the Republic to preserve this obligation ever fresh in grateful hearts. The dead, who have fallen in these struggles to prevent an alien flag from waving over the ashes of Washington or over the graves where sleep the great and patriotic rivals of the last generation, the hero of New Orleans and the illustrious commoner of Kentucky, can not return to us. On Shiloh's plain and Carolina's sandy shores, before Richmond, and above the clouds at Lookout Mountain, the patriot martyrs of constitutional liberty sleep in their bloody shrouds till the morning of resurrection. But the living are left behind. And if the sacred record appropriately commends the poor, who are ever with us, to our benefactions and regard, may I not remind you that the widow and the fatherless, the maimed and the wounded, the diseased and the suffering, whose anguish springs from this great contest, have claims on all of us, heightened immeasurably by the sacred cause for which they have given so much? Thus, and thus alone, by pouring the oil of consolation into the wounds that wicked treason has made, can we prove our devotion to our fatherland and our affectionate gratitude toward its defenders.

Half a century has since passed, and of that grand army of 2,772,408, less than 500,000 are still living. On May 1, 1914, there was upon the pension roll but 435,693, and they are diminishing at the rate of 100 each day. The Nation's defenders have enshrined themselves in the hearts of all our citizens, and the pledge of Speaker Colfax has been carefully kept by a grateful Nation. To care for those who fought our battles in war and are now dependent is not a gratuity; it is not a gift; it is not an unwarranted or groundless recompense; it is our Nation's duty in recognition of a just obligation. For four years at the time of life when young men fit themselves for future activities, and for a period of time equal to the full term of a college course, they set aside the hope and opportunity of a successful business career to uphold the flag.

The following statement shows that pensions were granted to colonial soldiers in this country for injuries and losses sustained in war:

1636. Pilgrims of Plymouth, a reasonable maintenance.
1644. Virginia Assembly, for disability and indigent families.
1676. Court of Massachusetts Bay, relief on application.
1691. Charter of Plymouth Colony, from public treasury.
1718. Colony of Rhode Island, to every disabled officer and private.
1776. Continental Congress, half pay to widows and children.
1818, March 18. For service to indigents.
1861, July 22. One hundred dollars and arrearage of pay and allowances.
1862, July 14. Specific rates to injured and disabled.
1866, July 25. Specific rates to minor children.
1886, March 19. Rate increased.
1890, June 27. Rate upon service and to widows.
1907, February 6. Age and service law.
1908, April 19. Increase to widows.
1912, May 11. Present age and service law.

It has been the policy of this country always to pension its deserving soldiers and sailors, and while in the main our pension laws are just and liberal, certain amendments would make them more so.

I would approve of a law providing that a war widow, living with the soldier during and since the war, should, upon the death of the soldier, draw his pension. She offered up many a prayer in her secret chamber for his success in the Army and suffered in hardships and anxieties during his absence. She has shared his vicissitudes in life and like him has done her patriotic duty since the war.

The rigid law of limitation within which a widow can be pensioned should be changed and the time of marriage to the soldier to entitle her to a pension should be shortened. It does not seem right that a widow who married a soldier in May, 1890, should under the law be entitled to a pension while one who married a soldier in July of the same year, 1890, should be denied a pension under the law. If she was the warden of the soldier and assisted the Government in caring for him in his helpless condition she ought to be rewarded.

In the construction of the pension law a soldier should be considered as physically sound when he enlisted, and the burden of proof that he was not so at that time should be placed on the Government.

I would like to see a competency paid to those brave veterans who, from whatever cause, whether from sickness or misfortune, since the war are now unable to work and unable to care for themselves and have the dread of ever becoming dependent removed.

The above or similar amendments would not perceptibly increase the amount now paid for pensions and would be doing added justice to those entitled to such benefits.

I am also in favor of the dollar-a-day Sherwood pension bill, and think the time fast approaching when it will be enacted into law.

The insult to our flag at Tampico stirred the patriotic blood of this great Nation and mobilized our Army and Navy; but what of tearing our flag from the custombouse at Manzanillo and stamping it in the street, as stated in the New York Sun of May 4, 1914:

> Enraged Mexicans made hostile demonstrations against Americans in the streets in the vicinity of the United States consulate, and the American flag was torn down, trampled in the dirt, and burned. Americans outside the city were charged 1,000 pesos each for safe conduct through the city to the steamer, and at least 50 were unable to pay that sum and were left behind.

Can an American citizen carry the red flag of anarchy in this land of the Stars and Stripes? To him should await but martial law, and dire consequences should be meted out to everyone claiming the protection of the American flag who dares to offer it insult. It is our national emblem; it stands for liberty, national sovereignty, noble Christian citizenship, and good will to all men, and it should be respected and protected in this and every other land while we endure as an independent Nation. I am not for war, and I am not for peace at any price. Hundreds of American citizens are fleeing from Mexico City under protection of the British flag. Where is our own flag?

Recently we have witnessed every indignity that can be offered against a nation—insult to our flag; murder of our citizens upon our own territory; slaughter, plunder, and rapine against peaceful American citizens residing in Mexico; our troops fired upon and shot; our consuls imprisoned and court-martialed. The property of our citizens has been looted and destroyed and they made to abandon everything and flee for their ransomed lives. If this calls for mediation only, when might war ensue? The country of Mexico, here on the very threshhold of our Republic, in this enlightened twentieth century, is undergoing a looting and barbarism that has never been eclipsed in any age or clime.

I have many times wondered if we are meeting our full responsibility in Mexico and doing our duty.

If we went to Mexico to appease the insult to our flag, and this was ostensibly the purpose, we ought to appease it and get out. But evidently that was not the sole purpose, and some are for getting out, while some are for going in, and evidently some are for standing still. As to what we should do, each seems to be left to answer or himself. If anyone feels comfortable standing still and looking on over the borders while innocent men, women, and children are being slaughtered by irresponsible bandits bent on loot, I am not one of that mind.

I am for raising our flag in Mexico until peace is restored and a stable government established, and I am for keeping it up until every citizen and country is indemnified for their losses. No other country but the United States can restore order in Mexico; no other country can secure a stable government there but the United States. And no other country can give the inhabitants of Mexico a better government than the United States. In the end action must be taken by the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I have received many petitions from the veterans of my district protesting against any change in our flag. I have only been able to find one bill introduced in Congress for that purpose, which follows:

House concurrent resolution 6.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the flag of the United States of America shall hereafter be as described: It shall consist of 13 alternating stripes of red and white, with a field of blue in which shall be stars to the extent of 48, arranged in a circle, to symbolize our Federal Union, which said circle shall be increased 1 star upon the admission of any other State. Within said circle of 48 stars shall be 1 large five-pointed star, constructed of smaller stars, which shall symbolize and represent our unparalleled Nation, the great Republic of the world. In the center of said star so constructed of smaller stars as above described shall be a red circle, which shall represent our colonial and insular possessions.

The change does not appear to be a violent one; but the old soldiers do not want it changed at all, except to add a new star for each new State, and they can not be blamed or criticized for that. It is the symbol of our nationality and representative Government. They want it to remain just as Francis Key saw it flying over Fort McHenry on the 21st day of September, 1814, in the dawn of the morning, from his prison on the British frigate in Chesapeake Bay. They want it just as Ellsworth hoisted it in Alexandria in 1861. They want it just as they fought for it, just as they died for it, and just as it looked to them when going into battle; just as it looked on the rampart and at Fredericksburg, and just as it looked at Appomattox. May its stars bedeck the earth like the stars of the firmament; may its folds kiss the breezes of every clime and its stripes bring that universal love of freedom, liberty, prosperity, and happiness which it bears to every living heart. It is the flag we all love. We can all indorse the beautiful lines of Nesbit:

Your flag and my flag, and how it flies to-day;
In your land and my land and half the world away;
Rose red and blood red its stripes forever gleam;
Snow white and soul white the good forefathers dream;
Sky blue and true blue, with stars that gleam aright;
A gloried guidon of the day; a shelter thro' the night.

Your flag and my flag, and oh how much it holds!
Your land and my land secure within its folds;
Your heart and my heart beat quicker at the sight;
Sun kissed and wind tossed, the red and blue and white;
The one flag, the great flag, the flag for me and you;
Glorified, all else beside, the red and white and blue.

[Applause.]

DIRECT VOTE FOR UNITED STATES SENATORS.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (S. 2860)——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is not in order under the rule under which we are now operating. The rule specifically provides that nothing shall interfere with the consideration of these trust bills except the further urgent deficiency bill, which has already been passed, conference reports, and appropriation bills, or the sending of bills to conference. Now, with those three exceptions, nothing else can be considered under this rule.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield? I am sure it will not take 15 minutes—possibly not 5.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state, in view of the fact the Speaker of the House has already ruled on this question, the present occupant of the chair does not like and would not undertake to overrule the Speaker of the House.

Mr. WEBB. Very well, Mr. Speaker; if the Chair feels that way about it, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri calls up the conference report which the Clerk will read.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 726).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill S. 2860 having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the House numbered 1 and 2 and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its amendment numbered 3.

Amendment numbered 4: That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Insert after the word "That," with which the amendment is introduced, the words "section 2," so that the amendment shall read:

"SEC. 3. That section 2 of this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval."

And the House agree to the same.

W. W. RUCKER,
R. F. BROUSSARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

T. J. WALSH,
ATLEE POMERENE,
WM. S. KENYON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT OF THE MANAGERS ON THE PART OF THE HOUSE.

The Senate receded from its disagreement to the House amendments Nos. 1 and 2, and the House receded from its amendment No. 3.

Amendment No. 4: The Senate receded from its disagreement to amendment No. 4 and agreed to the same with an amendment. As agreed to, amendment No. 4 will read as follows:

SEC. 3. That section 2 of this act shall expire by limitation at the end of three years from the date of its approval.

The effect of this amendment, as finally agreed upon, is to leave section 1 of the act permanent law and limit the life of section 2 to three years.

W. W. RUCKER,
R. F. BROUSSARD,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the conference report, and on that I demand the previous question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. The language of section 3 as it passed the House, I think, is "that this act shall expire by limitation." The conference report says that the Senate recedes from its disagreement and agrees to the amendment of the House with an amendment, as follows: "Insert after the word 'that' the words 'section 2,' so that it will read: 'That section 2 of this act.'" Now, that is a very small matter, except to the man who is going to enroll the bill. It does not propose an amendment to insert "section 2 of," but to insert "section 2."

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I will suggest to the gentleman that the section itself is set forth in full as amended.

Mr. MANN. The enrolling clerk thus finds in the conference report two contradictory statements—one where the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House with an amendment inserting "section 2."

Ordinarily that is what he takes; but if he takes that in this case he makes a grammatical or rhetorical error, but which, it is true, is corrected. I think the Members of the House who prepare reports where the enrolling clerk must enroll a bill and must follow the report of the committee on conference ought to have it so the enrolling clerk can follow it and know what he is doing.

Mr. RUCKER. I do not think there is any trouble about that.

Mr. MANN. It may be; the gentleman may think there may be no trouble. I consulted with the enrolling clerk of the House, who of course does not enroll this bill, because it is a Senate bill, and he did not know what he would do about it; and I do not know what I would do and I do not think the gentleman from Missouri would know what he would do about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, the conference report, as I understand it, makes permanent section 1, and the provisions of section 2 are to expire at the end of three years. Is that the result of the conference?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BARTLETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 89, noes 6.

So the conference report was agreed to.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule the House resolves itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the antitrust bill, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] will take the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657, the antitrust bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose on yesterday there was pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON], to which an amendment had been offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP]. The question now is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the committee has an amendment to this section which we think will satisfy the gentlemen who have offered amendments, and if they will withdraw their amendments we will now offer the committee amendment.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest and offer as a substitute for the pending amendment the following:

Page 22, line 22, insert after the words "is found" the words "or has an agent."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 22, line 22, after the word "found," insert the words "or has an agent."

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON].

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I am contented to withdraw the amendment I offered, with the consent of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] and of the House, so that it may not stand in the way of the substitute proposed by the committee.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DICKINSON. One second. I want to say this, that while I believe the additional words added would be a better amendment than the one proposed in the substitute, as far as I am concerned I will withdraw my amendment. But I want to give notice that when we reach section 10 I purpose to offer an amendment to that, using the words "or has an agent where the cause of action arose."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CULLOP. The substitute is perfectly satisfactory, and I think covers the whole question.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. As I understand now, you propose to amend the proposition by inserting after the word "found" the words "or has an agent"?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARTLETT. And that would apply equally to individuals as well as to corporations?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. So that if you could not find an individual against whom you desired to bring suit, but the agent of the individual, you could serve the agent of the individual. Is that true?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. Ought not the gentleman to further define the agent as an agent who has to transact the business of the corporation? If the gentleman will permit me just a moment; I do not desire to take his time unnecessarily, but it is an important proposition.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to this state of facts. This is an important proposition, because upon the service thus obtained will rest this suit and all suits. If you inquire into the various statutes of the States providing for service upon corporations and upon their agents you will not find, or I have not found at least, any place where the agent of an individual is permitted to be served by a process and to bind the individual.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. One moment. Let me finish this sentence. But you can obtain jurisdiction of the individual in any State where he is found by serving upon the person a copy of the process or writ. Now I yield.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will notice that this provision only relates to the district in which suit may be brought and has nothing to do with service on the defendant. In other words, if this language were inserted and suit might be brought in the district where one person had an agent in the form of another person, service on the agent would not be sufficient to bring the individual into court.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then if the purpose of the section is to give jurisdiction to the court in that particular locality, that court would serve its process upon those within its jurisdiction.

Mr. MANN. Well, it could not serve process upon an individual who was not within its jurisdiction?

Mr. BARTLETT. It could not. No.

Mr. MANN. So after all this provision apparently only fixes the district in which suit may be brought?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Now, it may be that you can serve the agent of a corporation and thereby get service upon the corporation, but you could not serve the agent of an individual and thereby get service upon the individual?

Mr. BARTLETT. Because there happens to be a provision in the Constitution that requires an individual to be sued in the district where he resides.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not. At least I do not think I am.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has in mind a provision about the criminal prosecution where the offense is committed.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; I have not. Anyhow, I will fortify my statement about that, if necessary. Anyhow, my judgment is this should be amended in order to make it safe. To give jurisdiction to a court in that district or that State or that locality over an individual who may have an agent not to transact this business about which you are suing him for, but to transact entirely some other kind of business, such as running a farm, would, in my judgment, be very fatal to it; and this provision with reference to the agency should be limited to the question of an agent of a corporation, because the statutes of the various States on that subject have been upheld.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, may we have a vote?

Mr. STAFFORD. I assume the gentleman will not object to five minutes being consumed on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] makes a like request with reference to the amendment to the amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SCOTT. What would there be before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] proposes to offer an amendment. Is there objection to the request made by the gentleman from Missouri and the request of the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw their amendments?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 22, line 22, by inserting, after the word "found," the words "or his agent."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I understand that some gentlemen desire to speak upon it.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment to my mind would bring about an anomalous condition. As the section now stands, providing that suit may be brought in any district where the defendant is found, it means that it may be brought in any district—and I refer to corporations—where a corporation may be found transacting business permanently.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Undoubtedly that is what it means.

Mr. SCOTT. It would not include any agent. The amendment enlarges the present interpretation of the word "found" as applied to the corporate jurisdiction, and permits suit to be brought, with absolute discretion on the part of the plaintiff, in any district in which the defendant may have an agent, without defining the character of that agent.

Now, we all know that there is an almost infinite number of characters of agents. Corporations transacting interstate business have agents, we may say, in practically every State of the Union for some purpose. Surely it can not be possible that the gentleman would attempt to confer jurisdiction and venue upon the Federal court in every district in the United States where any agent can be found, regardless of the question whether the corporation is domiciled in that State or district, or whether it is doing business there.

I believe gentlemen will find themselves in serious difficulty and confusion when it comes to certain other sections of the Federal statutes—those sections pertaining to the removal of causes, for instance, and in many others—because we have a consistent code of procedure at the present time. We have many expressions which through a long series of years of use have crystallized to well-understood meanings and interpretation. If we are to open this venue or jurisdiction to any district in the United States where any agent may be found, we are going to have a great deal of confusion and great injustice is to be done. It is going to open the door wide for annoyances to business, if any man can go anywhere in the United States and institute his action, if he can obtain any colorable service and compel the business institutions of the country to follow him about.

That has been one of the reasons, if not the cardinal reason, why the courts have given the present construction to the word "found," interpreting it to mean the place where the corporation does business, and in giving that interpretation, further, only those suits can be brought there which grow out of the business which the corporation is doing in that State or district. In other words, you can not go into the district of Texas and maintain a suit against a corporation in Texas, with respect to a cause of action which did not pertain to its business in Texas, but which pertained to its business in the State of its domicile. You are going to adopt that line of business if you adopt this amendment, in my opinion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. BOOHER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 150. Joint resolution providing for the taking for purposes of illustration of 30 specimens of Pribilof Islands fur seal for the collection of the United States National Museum.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2800) providing a temporary method of conducting the nomination and election of United States Senators.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

On May 27, 1914:

S. 4096. An act to amend the act authorizing the National Academy of Sciences to receive and hold trust funds for the promotion of science, and for other purposes.

On May 28, 1914:

S. 4632. An act for the relief of settlers on the Fort Berthold, Cheyenne River, Standing Rock, Rosebud, and Pine Ridge Indian Reservations, in the States of North and South Dakota.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SUMNERS and Mr. SINNOTT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I believe this matter of venue is one of the most important connected with the whole subject of antitrust legislation.

As suggested by the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. SCOTT], unless the venue be properly placed, on the one hand, you may subject the defendant to blackmail. We used to have a custom down in Texas under which suits would be brought in remote sections of the State and the defendants in humble positions would be compelled to pay the amounts demanded because they could not go to the expense of hiring lawyers, taking depositions, and so forth, to defend the causes of action far removed from their homes. The possibility of this sort of procedure ought to be guarded against. On the other hand, if the venue be not properly placed, the plaintiff in humble position may be deprived of the benefits of this bill. The philosophy of legislation with regard to this subject should give the venue at the place wherein the cause of action arises. The recognition of this right to parties injured runs through the whole system of American procedure. It has come down from the common law of England, in which Government it has stood the test of centuries. Why should you not bring a man before the court at the very place where the injury has been inflicted? Why drive a man who has a cause of action to a foreign jurisdiction in order to get his remedy?

I say to you gentlemen in charge of this bill that it ought to be amended so that a man who suffers in his goods or his business in a given locality may bring the man or the corporation that inflicts the injury before the court in that locality, and there have their differences adjudicated, instead of driving the man injured in Texas, for instance, to California or New York in order to procure a redress of the injury that has been inflicted upon him in Texas. It violates the philosophy of remedial legislation and is contrary to that system of procedure which will insure justice among the people and make this law effective.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield to his colleague?

Mr. SUMNERS. I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that in your city of Dallas, Tex., there are a great many distributing agencies of many manufacturing concerns all over the country, engaged in selling farm implements and farm equipment, and agencies for other purposes, and would it not be a great benefit to the people of our State who purchase machinery from those people to have the right to bring suit in Dallas, for instance, and serve the process upon the agent who has sold this machinery to our citizens? Would not that be a great advantage over the present law?

Mr. SUMNERS. That would be true; but if a corporation or individual, doing business in Texas, with an agent located in Dallas, should go into the Panhandle of Texas and there inflict an injury on a citizen living in the Panhandle of Texas, that citizen ought to have the right to bring the man or the corporation to the court in the Panhandle, and there compel reparation for the injury inflicted.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it the gentleman's construction of this amendment that if it is adopted an individual residing in Missouri, having a just complaint against a corporation residing in New York, may go down to Dallas, Tex., and bring a suit against that corporation in New York, and obtain service on an agent in Dallas, Tex., and that that service, under this amendment, would be valid?

Mr. SUMNERS. I am not talking about service. This confusion arises from not drawing the distinction between the individual upon whom service may be had and the place where suit may be brought. That is the confusion that arises under this bill. The service upon the agent is merely a technical method of procuring service upon the corporation, and the residence or nonresidence of the agent cuts no figure in the proceeding, save as it gives a means of getting service. It is all right, in so far as service is concerned, to provide in the bill that service may be had upon the agent and that service upon the agent is service upon the corporation. I am not criticizing that provision. What I am complaining of is that the provisions of this bill giving the right of recovery to the citizen injured by some act prohibited by the antitrust laws may become of no value to the humble citizen unable to go to a foreign jurisdiction to prosecute his suit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, can we not revert to section 3?

Mr. CARLIN. I think that was the agreement—that we should revert to section 3 this morning.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the committee will revert to section 3.

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CULLOP. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CULLOP. Is not the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] now pending and to be disposed of first? I understood it was introduced yesterday.

Mr. AVIS. I have not offered my amendment yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, strike out lines 16, 17, and 18, down to and including the word "products," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That it shall be unlawful for the owner, operator, or transporter of the product or products of any mine, oil, or gas well, reduction works, refinery, or hydroelectric plant, producing coal, oil, gas, or hydroelectric energy, or for any person controlling the products thereof, engaged in selling such products"—

Mr. BARTLETT. It is unlawful to do what?

Mr. FERRIS. That is stated in the language of the bill to which this is an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. In line 18 the word "product" occurs twice. Which one is referred to on this amendment?

Mr. FERRIS. The second one.

Mr. Chairman, on yesterday the chairman of the Judiciary Committee indicated a willingness to accept and the committee adopted an amendment which included minerals in place. I have been fairly active last night and this morning to determine whether or not that amendment was sufficient, and I have become convinced that it is not sufficient to include oil, the products of oil, or give us any relief, and of course it does not include water power or hydroelectric energy at all. So, if the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary or those gentlemen in charge of the bill will listen to this amendment, it does three things and no more.

It first prescribes the same sort of regulation for oil and water power that they propose in the bill for other minerals.

On yesterday the house adopted an amendment which I am to-day moving to strike out, with other language, and insert in lieu thereof the language just read by the Clerk. I do not know how the House will feel about it, for I know there is a strong disposition not to amend this bill; but when we come in here with an amendment or a section in this new bill which specifically regulates coal and other minerals, I can not for the life of me understand why we can not at the same time regulate the sale and handling of oil, gas, and water power. The oil question and the abuses that have grown up about it are so important, the appeals on every hand for some relief from it makes me feel a word on what the industry is would be of interest to this House. It follows, as developed in the recent hearings of the Oklahoma oil producers, and can be found on page 11 thereof:

PRODUCTION AND VALUE OF PETROLEUM IN THE UNITED STATES.

In the following exhibit will be found the production of petroleum in the United States since the birth of the industry in 1859 to the close of the year 1912, together with the daily average production and daily average value. (Supplement to the Oil and Gas Journal, Tulsa, Okla., Oct. 2, 1913.)

The shocking growth of this mammoth monopoly, which is now paying 50 cents per barrel for oil in Oklahoma oil fields and selling the same oil at Port Arthur to the Federal Government for $1.39 per barrel, and its profits and dividends are so amazing that it is worth while to pause and observe them. Its dividends, exclusive of other profits, since its organization are as follows:

At the recent hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee on this matter Mr. J. J. Maroney, an independent producer of Oklahoma, introduced into the record a comment on those figures that are as true and forceful as they are illuminating and instructive.

His remarks are as follows:

Magnificent though the figures above given are as representing the profits actually taken down by the monopoly during the years of its growth, they really present but the most trivial portion of the wonderful potentialities of the concern to extract profit from the business. There is no possible accounting of the extent of properties bought up by this company itself and by its numerous subsidiaries, side companies, and sometimes professed opponents, and much-advertised "independents." These properties were bought up at prices fixed by the conditions which it was in the power of the monopoly to make, having the power to fix and to manipulate the quoted prices of the crude article. The limitless power of the monopoly, in other words, has been but partially seen and exposed in the record of dividends actually paid. The relentless use of that power is seen in the conditions in the fields where the choicest properties are constantly gravitating to the possession of the interests in which the power vests. That the condition has not changed with the so-called dissolution is as plain as the virility of the exercise of the same power during the halcyon days of the open avowal of the monopoly and its purposes. The thoughtful will see in this plain lesson that unregulated transportation in the article is the thing that is to be dissolved if the prevailing conditions are to be changed, and not the monopoly, which is the inevitable fruition of that power which private control of transportation gives. While the fact continues that the article is transported by agencies which are subservient to private interests and not, as in all other commercial articles, to public interests, the private interests in control will naturally, inevitably, and always continue to soak up the profits in the business. Men are not rascals for doing this. By all rules of business, which has its resemblance to piracy in some of its aspects and always will have, those men are "shrewd"; and shrewdness is a relative term and trait. If all men were equally alert, each one just exactly the peer of every other, there would be none accorded the credit of being "shrewd." It is not innate perversity which guides men to take the limit of advantage which comes to them by the less than equal alertness of their fellows. The "general results" in part indicated by the table above spells more than anything else the lack of shrewdness which prevails in an industry where the burden of "hazard" falls apparently all to one side and the bounty of profit so largely to the other.

Our people have been robbed by pipe lines, by drilling offset wells, by refusing to carry the oil at all, by maltreatment until our patience is gone.

Oil from its character can only be carried through pipe lines, all of which are interstate, so they escape our State law, and it is up to Congress while legislating on trusts to relieve us from the most vicious of them all.

It can not await another session. It has waited too long now. We are on the subject of regulating trusts; our hands are to the plow; let us get some relief from such oppression to the people who produce, to the people who consume.

There is no more fertile field in which to work, and I think the committee should adopt this amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. FERRIS. The abuses of the Standard Oil Co. in my State are enough to amaze not only the State of Oklahoma but the entire universe. We are second in the United States in the production of oil. The State of California is first in its production. Our State, however, produces 65 per cent of the refinable oil of the United States. This morning I have submitted my amendment to some departmental experts of the Geological Survey. I have submitted it to the Assistant Attorney General for the Interior Department, in whom I have confidence and from whom I have received help before, and they think my amendment will accomplish much good and, in short, do the business. I dislike very much to come in here and offer an amendment to the bill of the Judiciary Committee, but on yesterday the committee said with great frankness that they intended to include oil, and I have no doubt they would be glad to include water power. If the amendment is not what it should be, we can perfect it in the Senate or in conference, or later you can revert to it and perfect it here. This is not the last word on the subject. There is no chance to go wrong when proceeding in the right direction. Undoubtedly this Congress ought not to pretend to legislate on minerals without including oil, gas, and water power. The worst monopoly in the country to-day is the Standard Oil Co. What earthly reason can anyone assign why it should be omitted?

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, in my haste I have omitted many of the things I feel duty bound to say with reference to the oil situation in my State and in the country. But for want of time I shall for the moment pass to a question so intricate, so monumental in importance, that I scarcely dare to try to say a word about it in this Hall of Congress. Up to a few months ago I might well and truthfuly say I knew little or nothing about water power or the many ramifications and intricate problems connected with it. I am again within the facts to say that I know now but little of it, its importance, or an intelligent handling of it. I must, however, in frankness say that during the last three months the Committee on the Public Lands have given the most patriotic attention and study to this monumental problem.

There developed in hearing much testimony brought to us by Secretary Franklin K. Lane, and, to my mind, he is the most efficient, the most capable Secretary of the Interior that the country has had in administering its affairs. The country is peculiarly fortunate in having a man at the helm who has first-hand information on these problems. The country is again fortunate to have a man who knows how to do and dares to do the things that should be done. Such a man is Hon. Franklin K. Lane, the present Secretary of the Interior.

His unbounded patriotism and industry made him willing to, and he did, turn over to the Committee on the Public Lands for their use, information, and edification two of his very best men, to wit, Dr. George Otis Smith, the head of the Geological Survey, whose industry, patience, and ability as a geologist and an engineer is worthy of the keenest commendation. Again, he afforded us and kept ever present in the committee during the sessions Mr. E. C. Finney, Assistant Attorney General for the Interior Department, whose efficiency and ability may well be acknowledged.

The Agricultural Department afforded us the services of the chief engineer of the Forest Service, Mr. Merrill, who gave us much valuable information that we needed to have in dealing with this intricate question. The chart which I have brought in before you and which now stands before you on the pedestal was prepared by the departments, pursuant to long, careful, and faithful work. It brings in a word what some would not have time to run down and shows clearly the interlocking situation with reference to water power and its various ramifications.

The hearings quite well disclosed that the control of the water powers of the country is coming more and more into a few hands. This was strikingly shown by the testimony given in the recent hearings before the Public Lands Committee and in the evidence there submitted. Not only is the complexity of interlocking directorates shown by the chart before you, but a statement discussing this control of water-power development in the Western States was incorporated in the hearings of our committee at the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. The statement goes into the matter with considerable detail and forms about 60 printed pages, and was prepared by engineers of the United States Geological Survey. The information regarding the water power developed in the 11 Western States is largely taken from original data in the files of the Geological Survey and the Forest Service, while the affiliations of the corporations controlling the great bulk of this power were ascertained by the works of reference dealing with corporation matters, as well as the current files of financial journals.

This statement is valuable as a continuation of the 1912 report of the Commissioner of Corporations on the subject, and it is especially noteworthy that the short period which has elapsed between that report and the preparation of the present statement, although only two years, has witnessed marked changes in the situation. In the first place, the increase in amount of development in these Western States has been large, while the tendency toward concentration into large financial units has been even more marked, so that the stage is already reached where the entire territory of these 11 Western States is practically divided among the larger companies. Thus 28 operating companies control 90 per cent of the developed power in the West, and 6 of these companies control over 100,000 horsepower each. Even more striking, however, is the increase in the number and importance of public-service securities holding companies during these recent years. While 3 of such companies were active in 1912 and were then noted as "general electric companies," these appear to have been but the forerunners of a horde of such corporations whose titles are characterized as simply "bewildering permutations of a few adjectives and nouns." It is because of the enormous capitalization of these companies and their large holdings of the securities of the operating companies I have just mentioned that the subject attains the utmost importance.

The system of stock holding through these holding companies is elaborate. While the stocks and bonds of the operating companies are offered to the public for investment, the controlling interest is usually retained by a holding company; in many cases the method of control exercised is publicly known, while in still other cases the holding companies confine their public reports of their activities to bare statements of the amount of securities held, concealing the identity of the operating companies over which control may be so exercised.

In the detailed statement submitted to the Public Lands Committee it is noted that while many of the holding companies, so far as public information indicates, have no relations with any particular operating companies, they do possess directors in common with other holding companies whose affiliations are more definitely known. Instances of interlocking directors, which of themselves might not be conclusive evidence that the same general financial interests are concerned, are repeated, however, to such an extent that a practically complete network of holding companies is established, and thus the evidence of community of interest becomes very strong. The compiled list of the important companies operating in the West includes 24 holding companies, and it is to be noted that certain men are very conspicuous. In these 24 holding companies 50 men together hold 135 directors' positions, so that if the 24 companies were considered as together forming one large corporation in which each man had as many votes as he now has in the separate companies, these 50 men would have little short of a majority. Further, 2 of the directors are each connected with 7 holding companies, 3 with 5, and 4 others with 4; all of these gentlemen are connected with the General Electric Co. and its acknowledged subsidiaries. The relations brought out by these lists of directors make it reasonable to assume that the General Electric Co. dominates the water-power situation. In some cases the companies are direct subsidiaries, in others they bear a subsidiary relation to the General Electric Co.; in the third class there is shown a predominant General Electric influence, while in the fourth class the companies are associated with the General Electric Co. through interlocking directors, and in a fifth class there is an apparent association through banking affiliations. The statement before our committee suggests that the harmonious relations between those who control the water-power situation of the West are to an important extent due to affiliation of interests of greater magnitude than may have been analyzed in this connection. It may be regarded as entirely probable that relations similar to those indicated in this statement and on this chart as existing between the operating and holding companies under discussion would be found to extend much further if the relations of the General Electric Co. and the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., the United States Steel Corporation, the Standard Oil Co., the Amalgamated Copper Co., and the large railroad companies to the great financial interests were studied.

The gist of the whole matter is that large and powerful financial interests of the East are strongly intrenched in their control of the water-power situation of the West as well as of the East. Future additions to their monopolistic holdings may be prevented by legislation now proposed by the various committees already mentioned, but that will not suffice. The present strangle hold by these big monopolies must be broken if the communities and industries of the West are to have freedom. Nor should we in our thoughts or in our legislative acts separate the mineral fuels and their monopolistic control from this subject of hydroelectric energy and its control; together the fuels and the water power constitute the great public utilities, which are not only of importance to present-day prosperity, but are coming more and more to be vitally essential to the civic and industrial life of the future. If trust legislation is to free the people, it should not neglect any one of these great natural resources—coal, oil and gas, and hydroelectric energy. The trusts have not neglected them.

We have had before us ex-Secretary of the Interior Walter Fisher. We have had before us Mr. Gifford Pinchot. We have had before us the head of the Geological Survey, Dr. George Otis Smith. We have had before us Secretary of the Interior Lane's most competent men to help us. We have had before us the best talent and the best information we could get on the subject. As a result of that we have reported a bill which the House may or may not reach this session. The parliamentary situation is such we can not, in all probability, reach it this session. In any event, we are at work on control and regulation of the abuses that have grown up in the mining and removal of coal and other minerals, and we should reach the other offenders, who are as bad or worse.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not get from the reading of the amendment at the Clerk's desk just what its purpose is. Its purpose is to include oil, gas, and water power, to give the same sort of regulation that the bill proposes to give to coal, minerals, and so forth; and if any live man on either side of this Chamber, inside or out of it, can assign one reason why it should not be done I would like to hear it.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. If your amendment carries, any concern that has water power to sell must sell it and can not arbitrarily refuse to sell it to any responsible person. The city of Seattle has a lot of current to sell, and if your amendment passes and the Stone-Webster people want to buy it, will we have to sell it them?

Mr. FERRIS. If they offer to pay the same price and you have it to sell. Remember this amendment or the original text has no application unless the commodity is being sold "arbitrarily."

Mr. BRYAN. Will not your amendment make every municipality in the country sell out?

Mr. FERRIS. No; you might as well say that every coal mine in the country would have to sell all their coal to a single concern. That was so stated here the other day, but no one could possibly be misled by that. The gentleman's trouble is not a real one, I am sure. It is purely fanciful.

Mr. BRYAN. How can the gentleman say that and say that Seattle must sell?

Mr. MANN. Look at the map.

Mr. BRYAN. I see the map.

Mr. FERRIS. This amendment, if agreed to, does precisely for water power and oil what the bill now does for coal.

Mr. GARNER. If it ought not to apply to coal, it ought not to apply to water power.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman speaks about water power. He means the current produced by water power?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; my amendment says the current produced by hydroelectric plants. There is no difficulty about that; it will include them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. The gentleman says operator or transporter. The question I desire is whether or not the word "transporter" carries with it the distribution of this electric current or the transmission of the electric current.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it would, and it would also include pipe lines, which is very much desired. The electricity and oil are only susceptible of one method of transmission; oil goes through the pipe line and the current of electricity is transmitted by wire. They ought to be included as common carriers and be subjected to the same regulation as common carriers. On yesterday the chairman of the Judiciary Committee expressed a willingness to take in oil, and I hope he will now consent to take in water power as well.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman believe that his amendment is sufficiently strong to include pipe lines carrying oil to market? I am very much interested in that, because the greatest oil field in the United States is in my district.

Mr. FERRIS. I think it is. Of course, if it is not strong enough, we can adopt this and then amend it. It ought to be drawn tight enough to accomplish it.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. If I remember aright, the Hetch Hetchy bill contains a provision that prohibits the city of San Francisco from distributing any electric energy from Hetch Hetchy to private corporations for resale. How would this provision affect that?

Mr. FERRIS. If the power they use themselves, this would not have any effect on it. As to the surplus power, it would decree that they should sell to those who applied on equal terms. It would at least prevent any arbitrary sale of it, and it ought to.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. Would the Great Western Power Co. and the Pacific Electric Co. come in on equal terms with private municipalities?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all; the city owns its own plant and can use it for its own purposes as it desires. That is a special act on a lot of conditions contained therein, and this does not meddle with that.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. But I am speaking about cities along the right of way.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think so; it would not apply any more than it does to the coal provision in the bill. You will recall that none of this section applies unless arbitrary methods are resorted to. There certainly can be no objection to that. The facts stated by the gentleman have no application here.

Mr. J. I. NOLAN. I understand that; but I want to know how this affects the Hetch Hetchy current.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think it affects it in any way. That is a special grant and it would not affect it.

Mr. DECKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. DECKER. I would like to ask the gentleman, in a word, what the meaning of this language will be after he amends it and what it means now? Does this section mean that a man can not sell to one man and withhold selling from another, or refuse to sell to another? Is that what it means, or does it mean that if you have anything of this nature mentioned in the section to sell, you would have to sell it if any responsible person wants to buy it?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman reaches to the main fabric of the section which was more fully explained by the chairman of the committee yesterday than I could do in the short time allotted me.

Mr. DECKER. I did not understand that explanation.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, the chairman of the committee can state it more ably than I can. In a word, my amendment does for water power and oil precisely what the Judiciary Committee seeks in this bill to do for coal.

Mr. DECKER. What does the section mean now is what I want to know.

Mr. FERRIS. I refer the gentleman to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DECKER. And then I want to know what it means after the gentleman has amended it by his language.

Mr. FERRIS. My own view is, and it is not the best or last word on the subject, it is intended as an antimonopoly amendment, and it seeks to keep the party producing from mines coal or other minerals from practicing extortion on one set of citizens to the exclusion of others. Its purpose is certainly a laudable one and I am sure it appeals to the gentleman.

Mr. DECKER. Does the gentleman think that that is what it does?

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is what it accomplishes. I am contending for the same regulation that they apply to coal to be applied to oil and water power.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest that the very energy produced by coal provided for in this bill is also produced by water power which you want to include.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is correct about that. I thank him for the suggestion. It is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for two minutes.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not want an extension of time unless it is for the purpose of answering questions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Oklahoma be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Before anybody will understand what this section means the court will have to pass upon it. Now, the definition of the word "arbitrarily" is the crux of the whole matter in this section.

Does the gentleman believe that this section as amended or as it now stands might be construed by the court to mean that any responsible purchaser might come and propose to purchase the entire output or product of any given corporation, and that corporation, notwithstanding the needs of various individuals in that community, could be compelled to sell its entire product to that responsible corporation if it offered the price demanded?

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can have his distorted idea of what it means. My idea is not a distorted one, nor is the idea of the Judiciary Committee distorted, but they are seeking to regulate the sale of the God-given treasures of the universe to all mankind alike, and the section, I think, accomplishes that. They might distort and force into it complicated constructions of it and try to make it mean something else, but I do not think so. I am willing to adopt in toto the views of the Committee on the Judiciary on the section and say that it is a good section, but I want to add to it two of the most notorious monopolies in the world and make it a better section.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is the gentleman able to suggest any further amendment that would relieve the section of the possibility of such construction? I am in sympathy with the gentleman's idea.

Mr. FERRIS. I will leave that to the Committee on the Judiciary. If the general tenor of the section is not pleasing to the gentleman or to the Members of the House, they can amend it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has again expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, the committee is not willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma, and I desire to state very briefly the reasons why we oppose the amendment and why we think the question involved in it should not be incorporated in this measure. The gentleman from Oklahoma is the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, and the question involved in his proposition constitutes one of the greatest and one of the most controverted issues in this country to-day, and it is the province of the committee, of which the gentleman is the chairman, to deal with this great question, and we do not think this trust legislation which is intended to deal with certain specific subjects and known evils ought to be loaded down with such issues as this. We think that the particular subject which he intends to embody here is worthy of a great and carefully considered bill, which I hope the gentleman's committee will bring into this House at an early date. He includes in his amendment questions and issues that are not embodied in the provision as it is written. In section 3 we deal with raw material, mineral, and mineral products, and your committee have stated heretofore that the language incorporated in the bill as originally presented was designed and intended to include oil and gas, but on account of doubts expressed as to that fact and as to the scope of the provision as written, we readily consented to the amendment which was adopted on yesterday, which expressly includes oil and gas, and when we have done that we think we have gone far enough. Gentlemen do not seem to realize in proposing this legislation we are not going along lines of easy resistance. Every proposition in this bill is controverted by terrific forces, and every gentleman who succeeds in getting a more drastic and far-reaching provision placed upon the bill is helping the enemies of the bill in addition to helping the proposition for which he stands.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman says that the committee of which I am fortunate enough to be the chairman should deal with this.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Undoubtedly the gentleman's committee has jurisdiction to deal with it.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, not at all. We have jurisdiction over the disposition of sites only, and have nothing whatever to do with the regulation of these matters. It is purely up to the gentleman's committee, and we have no jurisdiction over it. We have reported a bill with reference to the disposition of sites, but I know the gentleman from Arkansas on a moment's thought will recognize that we have nothing to do with the regulation of sites already existing.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Then I suggest that the gentleman should have appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary, if his contention is correct, and presented reasons and arguments in support of the amendment now proposed. I suggest the exceeding great danger not only to the ultimate fate of this bill but to its speedy consideration in bringing in propositions of such momentous importance as those suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma, who asks us on a few moments' discussion to accept them.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if his objections to the amendment are because of the fact that he fears it may endanger the passage of the pending bill, or because he thinks there is no merit in the amendment?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not exactly either and partly both. In regard to the first suggestion, I think that whenever we interject a proposition of that kind, on which there is a division, we do encourage and aid the enemies of the bill, because we bring new recruits to aid in the future those who are against the bill; and in regard to the merits of the proposition, I submit we have had no opportunity to consider them; and the gentleman from Oklahoma has offered the amendment here on the floor of the House and yet never before suggested to the Judiciary Committee, and no one else ever suggested, that that particular phase of the water-power question was a thing to be dealt with in this trust bill; and I insist it is not fair for the gentleman from Oklahoma, who has been giving this question great study, and which is an issue almost as great in itself as the trust question, to bring it in in this way before us and insist upon its adoption at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to say to the gentleman from Arkansas that I have not very much knowledge with reference to water power. Unfortunately or fortunately, I live in a country where we have very little water power, but I am especially interested in the provision relating to the transportation or sale of the crude oils and their refined products, which are produced to a large extent in my State. Does not the gentleman think we should have some relief?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is an intrastate matter, and we have no jurisdiction over that. We can only deal with matters in interstate commerce.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I was asking from the point of view of interstate legislation and not intrastate, and because I took it that the consumption of oil by the entire people of the United States is an interstate question and not an intrastate question.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. We have conceded an amendment as to oil and gas; we have allowed it to go into the bill. Now, there is another objection to putting this legislation in here. This, in so far as antitrust legislation is concerned, is a new provision, a new departure in legislation. Section 3 stands out alone, a new proposition, based upon certain conservation ideas in this country. The section as written limits its application to raw materials, the products of the mines producing iron, copper, coal, and other minerals, including oil and gas, but the gentleman proposes to extend its scope into the domain of manufactured products.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. And we draw the line in section 3 upon such products. It was insisted by some extremists that we ought to extend the provisions of section 3 so as to make them apply to manufactured products. It was not the purpose or the design of the committee to do anything of the kind, and the gentleman, on a much more difficult question, is seeking to depart from the original purpose of the bill and deal with manufactured products, such as electricity, when we refused to apply this section to any manufactured product of any kind whatsoever.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman think that oil which comes out of the earth or power produced by falling water is a finished product? What could be more God-given than those two things? Why does the manufacture occupy any different status——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. You will never pass any statute in this House or elsewhere that will control falling water that comes from the heavens. You are attempting an absurdity in such talk. You are endeavoring to control a product of manufacture as a result of water power. Electric currents sent by the hand and instrumentality of man by machinery into the current of interstate trade and commerce are manufactured and not natural products.

Mr. FERRIS. I will debate that with the gentleman if he so desires.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Is the gentleman aware of the fact there is now a bill pending and on the calendar from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce dealing with the question of water power?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I am perfectly aware of that, and I think the Interstate Commerce Committee and the Committee on the Public Lands, of which the gentleman from Oklahoma is chairman, are the committees that ought to take up this great question and deal with it in a separate bill, matured and duly considered in all its phases; and for that reason, not saying anything against the merits of the proposition, I oppose the amendment. It may contain merit, but I advise the House never to accept an amendment of such magnitude and of such far-reaching consequences as are involved in this proposal in this way.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the argument of the gentleman from Arkansas to this amendment might apply to any amendment that might be offered on the floor of this House. Certainly he does not propose to say that the membership shall be precluded from offering amendments, important or not important, if they happen not to have appeared before the committee and urged them there.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at all; but this amendment was brought in by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], chairman of a committee having jurisdiction of this question, and if he proposes to legislate in this bill concerning one of the greatest questions before the American people, and one of the most controverted, and incorporate provisions in this bill relating to it, I think it is due the Committee on the Judiciary, under those circumstances, that he should have appeared and submitted the matter to the committee.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. The very facts that the gentleman recites are additional reasons why this amendment should be considered and adopted. It comes from the chairman of the committee that has jurisdiction over the subject matter with which this amendment has to do, but that committee does not have jurisdiction over the precise thing involved in this amendment. One of the reasons why I rose, Mr. Chairman, was to answer my friend from Washington [Mr. BRYAN], who says that the adoption of this amendment would necessitate——

Mr. BRYAN. Attempt to answer.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. I will attempt to answer——

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman evidently did not expect to get recognition until I made my speech.

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Oh, I heard the speech, and sometimes the gentleman is heard without making a speech. [Laughter.] He contends that this amendment, or the adoption of the amendment, will force a municipality to sell out to a trust. I confess I do not like the substantive language of this section. It says it shall be unlawful for an owner or an operator of a mine or any person controlling its products to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to anybody who applies for it. If somebody who controls a product, heat, let us say, or power, should apply under this section to a municipality for that product and the municipality should refuse to sell certainly no court would hold that that was an arbitrary refusal where the municipality went into court and showed, as they could do under such circumstances, that the applicant for the power was merely trying to get hold of it for the purpose of monopolizing it and using it as a trust. That would not be construed as an arbitrary refusal to sell. The court would not therefore compel the municipality to dispose of the product to the first person coming along providing that was the kind of person it was. This is an important amendment, and it is important that it should be adopted, and the fact that Mr. FERRIS, chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, which committee has jurisdiction of this subject matter, happens not to have appeared before the Committee on the Judiciary and urged the amendment is no reason why it should not be considered, and every reason cited by Mr. FERRIS why it should be adopted is in my opinion sound, and I hope the committee will adopt it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 15 minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. CARTER. I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. RAKER. I want five minutes.

Mr. KENT. I would like to have some time.

Mr. WEBB. I will make it 20 minutes, and ask that all debate on this particular amendment may be closed in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 20 minutes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee to extend that time to about 40 minutes, because I am vitally interested in a portion of this amendment, and I would like an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. WEBB. I would like to inquire of gentlemen on the other side how much time they desire?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California, the gentleman from Washington, the gentleman from Wyoming, and several gentlemen here want five minutes apiece——

Mr. WEBB. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and section——

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; not on the section.

Mr. WEBB. I would like to get an agreement in regard to the time to be consumed on the entire section.

Mr. MANN. We might make an agreement in regard to the entire section.

Mr. AVIS. I would like to have about eight minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want about five minutes on an amendment which I propose to offer.

Mr. MANN. We would like to have 25 minutes on the coal amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I make this request——

Mr. MANN. Make a request as to time on this amendment, and then request for time on the section after that. I mean altogether.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask that all debate on this amendment and the other amendments to the section, and the section itself, be closed in an hour and ten minutes.

Mr. MANN. How much time do you want on this amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I would say 25 minutes on our side.

Mr. CARTER. I think you would want 30 minutes. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] wants to be heard.

Mr. MANN. Make it 45 minutes on this amendment. Then, how much time do you want after that?

Mr. WEBB. We want 20 minutes.

Mr. MANN. That would be another 45 minutes. Suppose you make the request to close debate on this amendment in 45 minutes, and then, after the disposition of this amendment, allow 20 minutes for debate on the section and all amendments thereto.

Mr. FERRIS. I hope the gentleman will leave the latter part of the request off. If this amendment is not adopted, there are other amendments I wish to offer.

Mr. WEBB. We are very anxious to close debate some time on this section.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit a unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS]?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to withdraw my amendment, on the condition that the Committee on the Judiciary, or the chairman, or any one of them, will in their own time, before this program is through, report back here an amendment that will include oil, gas, and water power.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I object. We can not agree to that. We have so much else to do.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think you ought to deal with coal and leave the others out.

Mr. WEBB. How about an hour and a half on amendments and the section?

Mr. MANN. That is all right. Forty-five minutes on this side and 45 minutes on yours.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this particular amendment and all the other amendments to the section be closed in 1 hour and 30 minutes, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the other half to be controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the section and all amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 30 minutes, one half of that time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. DAVENPORT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if I may have five minutes of that time in which to address the committee upon the question of the amendment relating to oil products?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; we will agree to that.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object just for a moment, I think the chairman of the committee has ample time, probably more than will be needed; but does not the gentleman think he ought to grant some time to the gentlemen who are in favor of the amendment? The gentlemen over there are against the amendment.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Oklahoma can speak for himself but for nobody on this side of the House.

Mr. FERRIS. I am not trying to say that all the gentlemen on that side of the House are against the amendment at all. I merely state that two members of the committee who were supporting the bill will undoubtedly be against it.

Mr. MANN. I am unable to learn that fact.

Mr. RAKER. I would like to submit to the gentleman in charge of the bill whether I might have five minutes in favor of the three amendments suggested by the gentleman?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there will be a particle of trouble in dividing up the time. We have been liberal enough to give time to those who are opposed to the committee's position. We are not disposed to be captious about it. We have ample time, but I think the debate ought to close in that time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed in 1 hour and 30 minutes, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]?

Mr. CULLOP. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask if all the amendments should not be presented and reported before the debate begins, especially the one on the coal subject? Unless this time is divided in some way between these two subjects that amendment will not be presented for discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that that matter is with the committee.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to have the attention of the chairman on that subject.

Mr. WEBB. In reply to that, Mr. Chairman, I think the proceeding we had yesterday is a good one—to present an amendment, discuss it, and vote on it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending.

Mr. LEVY. They say that all amendments have to be put in now.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this amendment, because, in my judgment, if it is adopted and made a part of this bill and finally becomes a law, we will venture into a sea of confused conditions and ideas with reference to the administration of this law which would be more complicated and confused and crossed and obscure than the diagram of the wires that we see in front of us and to which the gentleman has referred. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, the law which we propose to amend and which we have probably wisely proposed to amend, having passed one bill to give relief, known as the "trade-commission bill," is an advance along the lines of regulating and controlling interstate commerce and those who may engage in it. It took 20 years of consideration and adjudication of cases in the Supreme Court of the United States to finally reach a position where the present law is understood and can be enforced. It took 20 years in order to arrive at a point where sane and sound suggestions might be made and to propose sane and sound amendments to that law.

In 1910 this House passed an act putting oil pipe lines and things of that character under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and it has taken the Supreme Court a long time in that case and in its consideration, and it has not yet been able to render a decision of whether Congress has the right to regulate or control the transmission of oil through pipe lines. Now, we propose to venture further upon the sea of law and say that not only pipe lines and gas lines, but lines that transmit power by electricity, because it is produced by the water power of the land, shall be regulated by Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I am ready at all times to advance along lines where we may render relief to the people against monopolies and restraints of trade in interstate commerce. I do not concede the doctrine that Congress has any right to control the water power of the land except in order to provide for navigation.

I do not concede the right of Congress to regulate in any way the prices of water power generated by the use of the streams. And, so far as that is concerned, I have heretofore expressed my views upon the question and filed them in this House. In connection with the very able Members of this House now connected with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I have given my views on that subject; and whatever may be the clamor or the demand that we proceed and destroy all business of every kind and take away from the States the rights that have been conceded to them, I am not ready to yield to that public clamor now, nor do I expect hereafter to yield to it.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. BARTLETT. If I have time; yes.

Mr. FALCONER. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he thinks the natural resources in the Western States, for instance, or any other State, ought to be used for the benefit of the people of the whole United States?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, I think the States have the right, where it is not public domain or land that belongs to the United States Government, to regulate the water power on that domain and the resources of it through State laws in the States in which those resources are situated, and the States should not be interfered with by Congress, and I believe that Congress has not the right to interfere. I do not say that with regard to the Western States simply because the Western States have asserted that doctrine of late and have maintained it. I have asserted it as my doctrine with reference to the rights of every State, and that is the position that every man who hopes to see the perpetuity of our system of Government ought to take and stand upon.

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that this Committee on the Judiciary, after months of careful inquiry and patient study, dealing with the laws and decisions in the past, has brought into this House a bill covering all the subjects that they have deemed it wise and proper to consider for the purpose of amending the Sherman antitrust law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. My opinion is that in some phases we have gone too far; but this, I venture to say, is a venture upon a sea of uncertainty which you can not fathom and can not sail upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. KENT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, if there is any possible excuse for putting into this bill a clause providing for equitable distribution of coal these other sources of power and energy should without question be placed in equal position.

I do not know whether or not this bill will be of service to the public. I am not sure but that these matters can be equally well handled under the common law or the vague Sherman law, which has been made more or less definite by court decisions. But the bill is here before us, and if we are going to recognize the evils of monopoly in the anthracite coal fields, and possibly some of the other fields by this provision in section 3, we certainly should recognize the necessity of controlling other forms of energy. In a little while we shall clearly realize that the control of the mechanical energy of the Nation, either by the Nation or by the States on one side or by private and oftentimes greedy individuals on the other, means the welfare or the ruin of our prospects for greater equality of economic opportunity.

Gentlemen have talked about bills emanating from other committees. The bill from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, referring to power on navigable waterways, is based necessarily upon a request for a concession from the Federal Government. To my mind, it is sadly inadequate. As conditions precedent to such grants there may be demanded, and should be demanded, regulation in the public interest. In the water-power bill, which the Committee on the Public Lands has reported, we have worked on that theory and have fully protected the public. We find that we can control the concession granted by and in the name of the Federal Government for the interest of the consumers. But those sources of supply and those bills do not by any means include sufficient remedies against abuse that are to be attempted by this bill. They are merely incidental to a present partial public ownership. In this bill we are legislating concerning property in private ownership in order to prevent trusts and monopolies, resultant in extortion by the improper use of so-called private property, all of which is only held by the power and the privilege granted by organized society; and if we are to control monopoly of anything and prevent extortion under any cloak, we are here and now forced to control this water-power product in the interest of the public, whether situate on public or private land.

If we are going to demand equality of treatment in the oil and in the coal and gas business and in the other resources that furnish energy, the proper and only place where we can define such control is right here and now in this bill. If this bill means anything looking toward trust and monopoly regulation it certainly must take into account the control of these most important items. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I am as heartily in favor of any law that will restrict the Water Power Trust, the General Electric Co., or whatever you call it, as any man on the floor of this House. I believe in the public ownership of these utilities. I believe in the cities and communities owning and operating them, and I believe in putting this Water Power Trust out of business and taking away its rights entirely.

But under the present conditions these two forces are struggling for supremacy all over this country—the Water Power Trust and the public—in the various municipalities. The cities and larger municipalities come here, like the city of San Francisco, and get a grant from Congress, such as the Hetch Hetchy, and then counties and States are going into that line of activity more or less, and there is a continual fight between those two contesting forces. To-day the trust is trying to absorb every water power that it can and prevent the municipalities from winning or from progressing along those lines. The municipalities have the right and power of eminent domain. They ca demand and take away from the trust, and they can demand and take away from any private owner of these water-power grants their rights, and can appropriate them to the use of the municipalities and sell the current, sell the product of the water power at cost, without any profit whatever.

But now we come to a provision that requires any owner of such a water power—a municipality, for instance, after it does go through the condemnation proceedings and gets possession of it—to sell the product to any concern that comes along and wants to buy. We boast that our cities are able to sell this current cheap, and they are so able. They reduce the price continually. And so when the trust comes along and says, "I will pay you more than you are getting now for the current produced by this water right; I will pay you twice what you are getting"; and the city says, "No; I will not sell it to you." The Water Power Trust says, "By this bill of Congress you are compelled to sell it to me, and you can not refuse to sell it to me." Thus one of the effects of the bill would be to give the General Electric Co. and the Water Power Trust of this country that which is superior to the right of eminent domain against the municipalities of this land. It would be to give those people the right to take away from us, whenever they wanted to, those utilities by buying the entire product of the plant we had acquired.

I am willing to have a law of this kind passed if it provides that no such refusal to sell shall be permitted when in restraint of trade, and let it be determined whether or not each particular case is in restraint of trade. Let each case stand on its merits when the time comes; but I am opposed to putting into the law a provision that gives to any set of men the absolute, unequivocal right to buy in small or in wholesale quantities the rights that the cities of this land have acquired by all the toil and trouble incident to the acquirement of these utilities. These private individuals have the cash in bank. They can draw their checks for $500,000 or $1,000,000 and say, "Here is the money." The cities can not do that. The cities have to float bonds; they are hampered in every way about getting the money, so that the General Electric Co. could go to any city at any time and say, "Here, I want to buy your plant. You are competing, and we want your plant or the product of your plant. We have out there a competing plant. I will give you 25 per cent more than you are making now. Will you refuse?" The city would say, "Yes, indeed, we refuse." Then they will produce this law which says that it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any such utility to refuse.

Mr. SUMNERS. Does the gentleman contend that a private corporation can exercise the right of eminent domain against a municipal corporation?

Mr. BRYAN. Of course I do not. It can not do it; but you put this law on the statute book, and any corporation, firm, individual, company, or concern can go and take the product of a public utility away from a city merely by offering to buy and tendering the cash, and the city can not refuse; it is absolutely prohibited. The trust could go and get a court order compelling the city to deliver, and if they did not deliver, the mayor and council would go to jail. The corporations will not get the right of eminent domain, but they will get a power superior to it. If the cities of this country could go to a private corporation and say, "Here, we want to buy your plant, and here is the money for it, you have got to sell it to us," that would be an easy way of getting it; but they can not do that. They have got to go into the courts and have long procedure, and the delays incident to the exercise of the power of eminent domain before they get it; but here you want to fix it so that the General Electric Co. can come and say, "Here, we want this. Here is the money, and you must sell it to us." The little city of Bremerton has just voted on the proposition of buying the electric lighting plant. I do not know how the election went, but I think they will buy it. But in the meantime, under such a law as this, a private concern could exercise the right of buying up the product of that light plant after the city acquired it, and then they could raise the rates on the people. Let the people alone in this country and in a few years cities and towns will not be pestered by Boston financiers who are attempting to monopolize all the traction companies and other public utilities.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I confess I am not as much interested in that part of the amendment offered by my colleague from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], which relates to water power, as I am in that part of the amendment which relates to oil and gas. The State which I have the honor to represent in part is one of the largest oil-producing States in the Union, and yet new oil fields in Oklahoma are being brought in every few months. The independent producers and refiners in Oklahoma are without the proper protection from the pipe-line companies, owned or controlled by the Standard Oil Co. or its subsidiaries, one of the greatest monopolies to-day in the United States. The provision of this amendment relating to oil and gas is not broad enough to furnish all the relief necessary to aid the independent producers in the oil fields in Oklahoma, but it will be a start in the right direction, and I am anxious to see the amendment adopted, or a similar amendment, that will require the sellers of oil and its by-products to treat all customers fairly and to sell to all alike. I want to see the law so drafted that the pipe-line companies may be prohibited from engaging in the production of oil. If we can so draft the law as to prevent owners of pipe lines from engaging in the production in competition with the other producers, then we will have accomplished what is necessary to prevent monopoly in the oil fields by the pipe-line owners. Without assigning any reason and with no visible condition to cause a reduction the Standard Oil Co. and its subsidiaries, the Prairie Oil & Gas Co., began to reduce the price of crude oil in the Oklahoma fields and reduce the price from $1.05 per barrel in the Healdton field to 50 cents per barrel, and in the other fields in Oklahoma from $1.05 to 75 cents per barrel. The situation in the Oklahoma field is anomalous and seems to be growing worse daily, and the question is, What remedy is the proper one to enact into law so as to give the people who are producing oil and gas in Oklahoma the protection that they are entitled to?

I do not think the amendment that was incorporated in this section on yesterday is sufficiently broad to control those engaged in the transportation and selling of both crude and refined oil. I am specially interested in the oil proposition, because my State produces one-third of the output of oil to-day in the United States and almost 65 per cent of the refinable oil in the United States, and we are in a very peculiar condition in Oklahoma with reference to the production, transportation, and sale of oil. The independent producers of Oklahoma are absolutely at the mercy of the pipe-line companies as the purchasers of their oil. It was suggested to me awhile ago by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] that it was an intrastate question. I say it is not an intrastate question. We can regulate the sale and control of the product as long as we can consign it to points in the State; but we can only handle it to the State line, and then when it comes to a question of getting a market and transporting the oil and selling it beyond the State line it becomes an interstate proposition, and the pipe-line companies are to-day trying and doing everything they can to choke out the independent oil producer in Oklahoma and compel him to sell his product for anything that they choose to give him. Three months ago crude oil was selling in the Oklahoma fields at $1.05 a barrel.

The statement I am including in my remarks will show the production of oil from 1850 down to and including 1912. It may be claimed by some that supply and demand regulate the price of crude oil and that the reason for reducing the oil to the price it had been reduced by the pipe-line companies in Oklahoma is because of the quantity of oil they have on hand and the market for the sale of the same and its products. I do not believe this contention to be correct, nor do I believe the facts surrounding the transactions in the mid-continent oil field will bear out such a theory. It is indisputable that the pipe-line companies and the Standard Oil Co. are not developers of oil fields, but that the oil field is developed by the independent producer, who seeks out a location where he believes oil is to be found and spends his hard-earned money in developing the field. It is true that the moment the independent producer develops oil in a locality the great oil monopoly or one of its branches immediately rush into the field, through its paid employees, and begin to take leases and will, if possible, give a higher bonus for a lease than the independent men can possibly pay. Not only that, it is the history of the oil monopoly, so far as I have been able to observe it, that it will raise the price of oil and encourage development until an oil field is well developed and until the independent producers have invested heavily in production and development, and then it has been the experience of indepedent producers that the oil monopoly will reduce the price of oil for the purpose of forcing out the independent producer and compelling him to sell his product to the controllers of the pipe lines or the oil monopolies operating in the field. Another condition that is very detrimental to the independent producer and the independent refiners of oil is the fact that the pipe-line companies, or those who control the pipe-line companies, as soon as a field is developed, immediately begin to secure leases and become producers in competition with the independent producers and will develop the property belonging to those who control the pipe line in such a way as to force the independent producer to expend great sums of money in development to protect his line; that is, the pipe-line company, or those who own the pipeline stock, will secure a lease adjoining a lease belonging to an independent producer and will immediately develop their property by drilling wells along the line of the lease of the independent producer, and this forces the independent producer to drill his property or to permit the pipe-line company or the parties owning the lease with whom they are operating to drain his land through their wells. Such manipulation of oil leases in the oil field as I have just spoken of is largely responsible for the bankruptcy of many independent producers and works a hardship and disadvantage to all of the independent producers and damages them very materially in their properties.

The relief needed by the independent oil producers and the refiners in the way of legislation is a law that will beyond question make the pipe-line companies common carriers and prohibit a pipe-line company or anyone who is owner of the stock in a pipe-line company from engaging in or being interested in the production of crude oil in a field where the pipeline company that he owns or is interested in enters the field for the purpose of transporting oil from one place in a State to another place in said State or from one State to another. No common carrier should be interested in the production of the product it is carrying to the extent that it should be permitted to discriminate against those who are producing, by carrying its own product and refuse to carry the product of others. I want to see the oil industry prosper and I want to see men who invest their money make a profit, but I do not desire to see one class of men engaged in an industry and manipulate it in a way as to rob another class of men who are in a legitimate business for legitimate profit.

If the wells in the Oklahoma fields were permitted to run their full capacity, it would be 225,000 barrels a day: the reduction of 30 cents per barrel amounts to $67,500 a day that is being taken from the people of Oklahoma; less than what they were receiving three months ago.

PRODUCTION AND VALUE OF PETROLEUM IN THE UNITED STATES.

In the following exhibit will be found the production of petroleum in the United States since the birth of the industry in 1859 to the close of the year 1912, together with the daily average production and daily average value. Also the combined production and combined value through the series of years. Compiled by W. M. Dunham, Tulsa, Okla., from the records of the United States Geological Survey.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. I yield to the gentleman one minute more, in order to ask him a question. I wish to state to the gentleman from Oklahoma that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK], who seems to be something of an expert on this oil question, and who is just as insistent that oil be included in this section as the gentleman from Oklahoma is, offered an amendment which the committee accepted, so that the section would read that it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or natural mineral deposit to refuse arbitrarily to sell. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK], with his expert knowledge, assured the committee that "natural mineral deposit" included oil.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I hope the gentleman is correct. I have not run down the definition of "natural mineral deposit" sufficiently to say whether or not that is technically correct. I hope it is. I am in doubt, and I think the Geological Survey is in doubt upon that question.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am in favor of the Ferris amendment. Having determined that it shall be unlawful for one operator to dispose of the product of his mine to one and refuse it to another, which is intended unquestionably to mean coal, there can be no question why the operator of the oil well should not come under the same category as the mine owner. It is for the same purpose, used in the same way, and if one should be controlled the other should. There is no distinction to be made in regard to gas. The committee has fully and thoroughly gone into this subject and determined that this legislation is necessary in regard to coal mines. Now, it is not a question of going into the natural features as to oil and gas; it is only a question for the determination by the House whether or not they should apply the same rule to oil and gas as they apply to coal; and to the question of hydroelectric power, which is the fourth subject, it is the same as the other three.

The committee has determined that it should regulate the question of coal. The question of the conservation or the nonconservation, whether a man should have the right to build a reservoir on the public domain, what should be the rules of the Government in regard to it, how much he should pay, whether or not navigable or nonnavigable streams should be regulated, whether or not the bill as prepared by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce should be passed, whether or not the bill of the Public Lands Committee should be passed, has nothing to do with this question. Having once determined the right, having once entered into interstate trade, can there be any reason why you should regulate the man that handles the coal, and should not control the one that deals in oil or gas that covers all the various industries as coal, and the same way in regard to hydroelectric energy that is distributed?

It does not matter what the Government is going to do on navigable streams nor as to the method regulating it, nor does it apply to the nonnavigable streams on the public domain. All those things will be disposed of by proper legislation, and in due time—and that will be at this session of Congress. But the point is that having once determined the right, the man entering into business in distributing hydroelectric energy, in distributing oil and distributing gas, should be placed on the same basis, under the same rules and restrictions, as the man who is dealing in coal. The question suggested by one gentleman opposed to this amendment that a man can go out and buy out these dealers or distributors of gas and electric energy is all moonshine of the worst kind, because this bill is intended only for the purpose, as I have stated—that when you have a supply of hydroelectric energy, if he is supplying it to any particular locality, then he must supply it to the adjoining city or the adjoining party who desires to have it for mining or milling purposes. You could not buy the whole plant. It is only a question of saying that A and B shall be equally treated; that they shall be permitted to buy at the same price; not that you can go in and say, "Mr. A, I want to buy you out, and you will be compelled to sell or else come under a penalty." I therefore trust that the committee will adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL].

Mr. BEALL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, the committee in framing this bill attempted to reach certain evil practices connected with the conduct of business in this country and at the same time sought just as few restrictions as possible consistent with reaching the recognized evils.

In the conduct of business in this country it has always been recognized that a man should have a right to select his own customers, and the committee in this bill specifically prescribe that that right shall remain with the man who is proposing to do business. But the question came up that with respect to certain natural products there had been abuses of such a character that some regulation was demanded. So the committee put into this bill the provision that the man who engaged in commerce who owned mines and handled the product of the mine should not have this right, ordinarily given a man who is engaged in business, to select his own customers, but that he should be compelled to sell that product to anyone who applied to him for purchase; in other words, that he should not have the arbitrary right to refuse to sell.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEALL of Texas. I will.

Mr. RAKER. A man, on the one hand, operating a coal mine and the other a gas well—can there be any distinction between

Mr. BEALL of Texas. As I understand it, the bill as it stands

Mr. BEALL of Texas. As I understand it, the bill as it stands now has been broadened so that there is no question but that it includes not only the product of the mines, but also the product of the gas and oil wells. Those are great natural products. Now, gentlemen say because you include coal you ought to include gas and oil. Very well; we have done that. Now they say, having included the natural products, you must go a step further and include all the instrumentalities that are used for the distribution and use of the natural products. The gentleman from Oklahoma says you must include the pipe lines. If they are pipe lines operating wholly within the State of Oklahoma, they are within and under the control of the State of Oklahoma. If they are pipe lines operating in interstate business, they are all under the control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, placed there by Congress. Whatever regulation may be necessary for the control of pipe lines Congress has already authorized and empowered the Interstate Commerce Commission to provide.

Now, gentlemen go further and say that you ought to include not only these natural products but those things that are manufactured out of the natural products, the refined oil; you ought to include not only water power but electric energy that is developed from water power. You see that there is a progressive demand and that there is no end to it. If you ought to include electric lines because electricity is developed by water power, then you ought to include steam, because steam comes from coal.

Mr. FERRIS. They are already controlled.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. And you ought to include the manufactured products of the factory, because they are manufactured by a power which is generated by steam that comes from coal, that comes out of one of these mines, and so on and on. This committee, as I said in the beginning, attempted in this bill not to cover the whole universe, not to cover or attempt to correct every conceivable evil that might arise in connection with doing business in this country, but it sought to reach certain recognized, well-defined evils, to bring them under the inhibition of the law, to apply the corrective power of the law to these specific things, and it is my judgment that you will have a much more effective law, a much simpler law, a much better law, if you will limit the provisions of this bill to universally recognized evils, correcting them, and when you have done that I think the country will be willing to approve your efforts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTER].

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Chairman, I am very glad to know that my friend from Texas [Mr. BEALL] wants to confine the operations of this bill to some specific injustice, for there is no business under heaven's canopy that has been the subject of such oppression and mistreatment as has fallen to the lot of the independent oil producers in Oklahoma. We have in that State five pipe-line companies, all owned or controlled, it is asserted, by the Standard Oil Co. These oil companies, it seems, in order to evade responsibilities as common carriers refuse to ship the oil of the independent producers, but buy it at their own price. They have the independent people completely at their mercy and can purchase oil at their own price, for they make of themselves exclusive purchasers when they refuse transportation of the product of any other person. Having a monopoly of transportation facilities they can and do fix the price of oil as best suits their convenience. This is not the worst. If the pipe-line companies would only take the oil production at their own price, the independent producers might be able to exist; but it is asserted by the independent producers—and I believe it to be a fact—that the pipe-line companies will not give independent producers a fair distribution in transportation.

The oil of the independent producers is flatly refused at any price until the production owned by the pipe-line companies is taken care of. This is the worst monopoly on the face of the earth. It is worse than monopoly; it is larceny, for the pipe-line companies themselves, mind you, are producers of oil and own leases and titles to land right adjacent to that of the independent producers. I say larceny, because when they refuse to take the product of the independent operator they simply draw the oil from his land beneath the surface and produce it from their own wells, so that within a few years the independent producer finds his profitable oil well converted into a "duster."

I want to call your attention to the Healdton field in my home county. This Healdton field was brought in about eight or nine months ago, and arrangements were made with pipe-line companies to take care of the production at $1.05 per barrel, and the pipe-line companies continued to take this product at $1.05 per barrel until 60 or 90 days ago. Then within 30 days different cuts in price were made by pipe lines, who are the only purchasers, and who have a complete monopoly of the field, until oil to-day in this field is only worth 50 cents per barrel. The Healdton producers when they were induced to develop that field were first led to believe that they would have no difficulty in getting pipe lines to take all the oil they could produce. At different times restrictions in the amount transported have been made until now the pipe-line companies refuse to carry over 8,000 barrels per day, and I see by the papers that one of the many wells in this field is now producing 6,000 barrels per day. So that the pipe-line companies really will take only 2,000 barrels more than the production of the largest well. A cut in price within 30 days from $1.05 to 50 cents and a reduction of the amount purchased from perhaps 20,000 to 6,000 is the deplorable condition that the small operators in this field are up against.

Mr. BEALL of Texas. How can we reach that by this law? How can we compel a man to buy?

Mr. CARTER. Oh, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman had five minutes and I wanted to interrupt some of the statements made by him very badly, but I did not do it on account of the short time he had, and I hope he will now let me continue.

This amendment may not reach that specific point, and I believe it can be improved upon, but as has been said by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] most of that can all be trashed out either by the Senate or in conference, so that our people will get some relief.

My friend from Texas [Mr. BEALL] asserted that pipe lines had all been taken care of by Congress. I would like to know when that was done. I also want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the decision of the Commerce Court held that pipe lines were not even common carriers, and for this reason our small operators in the past have been unable to get them to take any part of their product at any price, not even at 50 cents per barrel. If the Supreme Court of the United States should reverse the Commerce Court and declare these lines to be common carriers, that would give considerable relief, but what should be done is to divorce production from transportation. Pipe lines ought not to be permitted to own oil deposits, for whenever they do you will place all other operators completely at the mercy of the pipe lines and permit them to rob them of all their own oil, as I have already stated, by drawing it off through the wells of the pipe line company.

You have a bill here to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies and other purposes. You are providing for relief from monopolistic oppression along other lines. On what ground, then, do you refuse to assist the small independent oil operators in the State of Oklahoma and other oil-producing States?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the logic of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] seems to be that an evil must grow intolerable before it should be dealt with by legislation. That is hardly the end and aim of this legislation, if it is to protect the people against the evils of monopoly. I hope that this amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] will be adopted, because without it this bill will not touch one of the mightiest potential monopolies in this Nation. Charles Steinmetz, consulting engineer of the General Electric Co., made a statement recently in which he pointed out the possibilities of water-power development, and said that in a few years not a running stream of water would be found in the country but that the water would be stored in reservoirs and dams to furnish power to be used for every routine duty of the household, as well as for transportation.

The General Electric Co. at the present time owns 35 per cent of the developed water power of the Nation, and will become one of the main monopolists of the Nation if this monopoly is to be permitted to continue. Without such a provision as this amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, it seems to me, this antimonopoly measure would be as bad as the tragedy of Hamlet with Hamlet left out, because the railroad monopoly, the United States Steel Trust, and other monopolies will be as nothing compared to the menacing possibilities of the water-power monopoly of this Nation, unless action be taken in time.

We have heard from the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] of the sanctity of State rights and that such sacred rights must not be desecrated. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that the State rights theory has passed its day and we are not solving national problems by piecemeal and by fractions in this year of 1914. Here is a problem, national in scope, that touches the people of the United States, and this amendment should have the support of every Member of the House who believes that the people of the Nation make up an entity and that a State can not be expected to solve a national problem such as the water-power monopoly, which concerns every man and woman and child of the United States.

President Roosevelt in his message in 1908 called attention to the fact that the water monopoly threatened to become one which would interfere with the rights of every American citizen. In his message of February 26 of that year he said:

> Among these monopolies, as the report of the commission points out, there is no other which threatens, or has ever threatened, such intolerable interference with the daily life of the people as the consolidation of companies controlling water power.

Must we wait until this "intolerable interference with the daily life of the people" becomes an accomplished fact before dealing with it? Surely we have seen enough of that kind of let-alone policy, which has resulted in a brood of marauding monopolies, to convince us that an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.

I would call your attention, further, to the recent report of the Inland Waterways Commission, which contains the following statement:

> Wherever water is now or will hereafter become the chief source of power, the monopolization of electricity produced from running streams involves monopoly of power for the transportation of freight and passengers, for manufacturing, and for supplying light, heat, and other domestic, agricultural, and municipal necessities, to such an extent that unless regulated it will entail monopolistic control of the daily life of our people in an unprecedented degree.

The Nation must act if we are to prevent special-privilege control of the sources of power and its production and distribution. Here is an opportunity to do something now, and I hope that this House will show its appreciation of the value of this great asset of the American people. If the section means anything, this amendment will reach the question of water power, the basis of the greatest monopoly possibility in the Nation. That is the demand of to-day—not to wait until intolerable evils have grown up, but to guard against conditions which may become intolerable in the future. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. May I inquire of the gentleman from Minnesota how much more time he desires to use on this amendment?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a substitute for this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 21, line 17, strike out all after the word "mine," all of lines 18 and 19 down to and including the word "commerce," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Oil or gas well or water-power plant, or anyone controlling the products of mines, oil or gas wells, or water-power plants to discriminate in price or otherwise as between persons or places for a like product delivered under similar terms and conditions, or."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that an agreement was made in regard to a division of time on this one amendment and that the amendment of the gentleman is not in order until this amendment is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not understand there was any agreement in regard to the limit of time on any amendment, but there was an hour and 30 minutes limit put upon the section and all amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. I did not understand it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the agreement as the Chair understood.

Mr. FERRIS. That does not preclude the offering of additional amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. It does not preclude the offering of amendments, but it precludes debate on them, except within the time limit set.

Mr. FERRIS. Suppose the hour and a half is all consumed in debate?

Mr. MANN. It will not be all consumed on this amendment, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. FERRIS. I want to offer some other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the committee, in reporting this bill, intended to compel miner operators, and those controlling mine products, to sell their products to whoever made a reasonable offer for them. That is undoubtedly the intent of the provision. Unfortunately it is not happily stated, and if the paragraph were adopted as it is in the bill it would take the courts the next 20 years to determine what constitutes an arbitrary refusal to sell a product. What we ought to do, if we are going to legislate on this matter of the sale of products at all, is to say that there shall be no discrimination as between persons and places in the sale of products delivered under similar terms and conditions. That sort of a provision will meet the evil we seek to meet, the evil under which the owners of mines, the owners of oil wells and gas wells, the owners of water-power plants sometimes refuse to sell to any except those with whom they have made contracts. It would take the courts a good long time to decide whether such a refusal was an arbitrary one if it were not an outright refusal, but an offer to sell at an impossible price and under conditions of delivery to which a person seeking to purchase could not accommodate himself.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Under the gentleman's amendment would a coal operator be compelled to sell 10 tons of coal at the same price as he sold 1,000 tons of coal?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is a good judge of the English language, and he knows that under my amendment he would not be required to do it; he would be required to sell a like product under similar terms and conditions of delivery and in like quantities for the same price. In other words, he would be compelled to sell to Jones, if he had it for sale, the same amount of coal in the same quantity and under the same terms of delivery at the price at which he sold to Brown.

Mr. AUSTIN. How does the gentleman interpret the original provision of section 3 on that point?

Mr. MONDELL. It is impossible for anyone to interpret it. As a matter of fact, the point I am attempting to make is not directly treated in section 3. All that section 3 says is that there shall not be an arbitrary refusal to sell. What is an arbitrary refusal to sell? And is there a gentleman here who can venture, or will venture, a guess as to what the courts might say constituted an arbitrary refusal to sell? I have intended in my amendment to cover the ground covered by the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma, and in addition to that I have attempted to define what it is that we seek to prohibit; that is, the refusal to sell the same product under similar terms and conditions of delivery at the same price to all who may seek to buy.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. WEBB. We intended to cover that very proposition in section 2 of the bill. Section 3 goes a little further, because we are dealing with products of the mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is the first time I have had an opportunity to address the committee since the trust bills have been before the House, and I ask that I may have five minutes additional.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the committee has limited the time for debate. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed five minutes additional, not to be taken out of the time limited by the committee.

Mr. WEBB. Can not the gentleman from Minnesota yield the gentleman more time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not able to give it.

Mr. WEBB. I am sorry we have not the time. I had to cut a gentleman down to three minutes to whom I had promised five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is aware of the fact that owing to other duties it has been impossible for me to be on the floor during this discussion, and I have up to this time had no time. Of course, if the gentleman does not care to have me use five minutes, he can object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, my opinion is that there is a real evil that we must meet. There has been a great deal of complaint throughout the country of the high price of bituminous and anthracite coals in many localities. When you come to investigate that question in its relation to bituminous coals you find this to be the fact, that bituminous coals are sold at the pit mouth all over the country under the keenest competition and at low prices—at prices so low that it is difficult, owing to the competition, for the operator to make proper provision for safety in the mines. But before the coal reaches the consumer it has gone through processes of contract under which the consumer is compelled to pay in many instances an outrageous price. If we prohibit the refusal to sell to anyone who seeks to purchase, and do it in an equitable way, as provided by my amendment, we will, I believe, relieve a situation which is acute and intolerable in many parts of the country.

Gentlemen have referred to oil and water power. My motion is that, while the amendment would be useful and valuable with regard to oil and water power, it is of even more importance with regard to bituminous coal. It may be exceedingly important with regard to the sale and distribution of water power. While we are legislating on this subject we should make it very clear and definite what it is that we prohibit. My amendment, reading it with the balance of the section, is that it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine, oil or gas well, or water-power plant, or anyone controlling the products of these mines or wells or plants, to discriminate in price or otherwise between persons and places for a like product delivered under similar terms and conditions. And then it shall be unlawful for them to arbitrarily refuse to sell. My amendment definitely states what it is we prohibit, and the courts will then have no difficulty in determining what constitutes an arbitrary refusal to sell.

Mr. LEVY. Will my colleague allow me?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Without a provision of this kind it will be utterly impossible for the courts to determine. An operator may offer to sell at a price far above what he is receiving from others. He may offer to sell under impossible conditions of delivery. He may agree to sell quantities in excess of the needs of the purchaser, and the courts will have no sort of guide without some language such as I suggest as to what constitutes arbitrary refusal to sell. If my amendment is adopted, then we shall have prohibited discrimination as between persons and places for like quantities under similar terms and conditions, and the courts will be able to determine in each individual case whether the law has been violated.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LEVY. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not consider the United States acted arbitrarily in Alaska in refusing to sell coal lands or opening them up?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, yes. But because some officials of the department may have done wrong, there is no reason why in legislating now on this matter we should not do our duty. I do not fear the effect upon legitimate operation of legislation of this character when it is properly drawn and clearly defines its purpose. Such a provision as this was contained in a bill for the leasing of coal lands in Alaska, which I introduced several years ago, and which should have become a law. Such a provision is contained in two bills which I have introduced at this session of Congress for the leasing of coal and oil and gas lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended for half a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed half a minute additional. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Well, I will have to object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard. The question is on the amendment——

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON].

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment enlarges the present section of the bill by proposing to include in it coal, gas, oil, and hydroelectric energy. The amendment adopted to the section on yesterday, which was offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BATHRICK], included mineral deposits. It seems to be conceded that coal and oil and gas are included in the words "mine or mineral deposits," and I shall therefore confine my remarks to the question of hydroelectric power. In my opinion, there is no question before the American people that is quite so large and important as the regulation and control of water-power corporations and monopolies throughout the country, and I concede to no Member here a more progressive spirit in that direction than I entertain. I believe it is such a large question that more consideration should be given to it than the few minutes' discussion that we have had here in the House on this section. It is so large and important that three committees of this House have been working on it for many months. This amendment is carelessly drawn. There is even a variance of opinion between those Members of the House who advocate the amendment, not only in the meaning of it but the effect of it. You can not legislate intelligently on so important a matter in an hour and a half's consideration.

There is now on the calendar of this House a bill reported out of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce that deals with this question intelligently. I believe it will be called up for consideration and passage before the House adjourns. There has also been reported by a subcommittee to the full Committee on Foreign Affairs a bill dealing with the question of hydroelectric energy developed at Niagara Falls. That bill will be reported to the House shortly. There is now on the calendar a bill that deals with the question of hydroelectric energy generated from water power on the public lands of the country, reported out of the committee over which the author of this amendment, the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], presides. These bills deal with this question in all its phases, and will give all the Members of the House an opportunity to express their views, so that we can really get at the very milk in the coconut of this question. And it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we ought not now to pass this amendment that deals with it in a loose-shod kind of a way and does not give the relief that is really needed.

The question that actually confronts us is not, so far as respects hydroelectric energy, that water power companies will not sell their hydroelectric energy to other concerns or people, and thereby create a monopoly, but the important question, so far as concerns water power, is that these companies charge too much for their current and they are not answerable, so far as service is concerned, to the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States or the public service commissions of the various States.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I can not yield now; I have but three minutes.

That is quite a different proposition from that which would apply to coal and to mines, because the mines and mineral products of the country have been gobbled up and controlled by a few companies to that extent that the owners of them will not sell their products so that the people can be benefited. They are withheld from the market for various reasons. The greatest trouble with the water-power companies is service and rates. Let us wait and pass such water-power legislation as will deal with the question fully, completely, and intelligently. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 39, noes 45.

So the substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. After the word "production" in the amendment I desire to add the word "transportation." I think the gentleman will accept the amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. I will vote for it. Go ahead and offer it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state the amendment again?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The word "transportation" already comes in after the word "production"—hydroelectric plants, production, transportation, coal, oil, gas, and so forth. It only carries out the idea of placing pipe lines in this amendment. If the gentleman will not accept it, I will withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman will be permitted to withdraw his amendment to the amendment. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 58, noes 24.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chairman appointed Mr. WEBB and Mr. FERRIS to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 65, noes 28.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 17, after the word "mine," insert the words "except bituminous and semibituminous coal mines," and on line 18, after the word "mine," insert the words "except as aforesaid."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to except bituminous and semibituminous coal mines from the provisions of section 3.

I have already at great length discussed this subject, but feeling as I do, and, as I have said before, that if this section becomes a law it will promote and create monopoly rather than destroy it, I want, in the limited time that I have, to repeat some things that I have already said.

In the first place, there is no such thing as a monopoly of the soft-coal industry of the United States. There are at this time over 6,000 of these soft-coal mines throughout the United States, located in the great States of Illinois, Pennsylvania, Ohio, West Virginia, Kentucky, Virginia, Alabama, Washington, Utah, Wyoming, and a number of other States, and these mines are owned by over 3,500 separate and distinct owners.

Now, if this section becomes a law, from the little knowledge that I have of the coal business—and I claim to have some knowledge of it, having lived in a coal-producing section for 25 years—I believe it will absolutely permit the large corporations, the very ones you are aiming this section at, to destroy the small corporations.

There are three classes of concerns engaged in the soft-coal production industry. There are the large corporations that have a tremendous output, that are enabled to place their agencies and storehouses over the United States and supply such demands as may be made upon them. These corporations maintain expensive sales agencies, and they have their own men to represent them. There is a second class of coal producers in this country who sell a portion of their output to certain dealers and employ agents and brokers to sell the balance. The third class—and the great majority of the mine owners in this country belong to that class—consists of those who have an output of about 400 tons a day, or less, who are unable to maintain their own sales agencies and who do not handle the sales end of their business. In order to dispose of their respective productions these concerns are compelled to employ agents and brokers to work up a trade for their coal upon commission, in such territory as may be assigned to them, and these operators compete with the big operators in such territory.

For instance, these small operators, on account of the good quality of their coal and on account of the extreme care they take in preparing it for the market, have customers who have been brought to them through the quality of their coal and the efforts of such agents and brokers in the respective territories that have been assigned to them, such as the lake section, the Northwest, or New England.

Now, what is the result? Under this section such small operators will be compelled to sell their coal to the first responsible firm, person, or corporation who applies to purchase it—not alone for use or consumption but for the purpose of resale.

Now, what is to prevent me, if I am a big operator or big corporation, with whose coal the coal of the small operator is competing in that territory, from going to him, under this section, and saying, "I am a responsible bidder; I will buy your entire output for this year"? I might be buying it for some unfair purpose, and could destroy his trade in that territory, yet this section would require the small operator to sell to the large operator and would thereby enable the large operator to destroy the small operator, who is dependent upon that method of disposing of his product.

Now, if there were a monopoly in this business the situation would be different. I realize that this committee is trying to curb monopolies, and I am in favor of preventing monopoly; but, as I said before in this discussion, there is no such thing as monopoly of the soft-coal business of this country. Competition is so great to-day among the soft-coal mine operators of this country that they have scarcely made a dollar in the last five years, and none of them, with perhaps few exceptions, has made a dollar in the past year, and that is largely due to the fact that there is an overproduction of soft coal throughout this country. The competition is so great, as I said the other day—and the figures will bear me out—that we are selling coal to-day at about the same prices at which we sold it 8 or 10 years ago, notwithstanding the fact that freight rates, wages, and mine supplies have doubled in cost. Therefore, if this section becomes a law you will be playing into the hands of the big fellow.

In the limited time that I have let me also invite your attention to the fact that this is a tremendous industry, and a great many States are engaged in it. In 1909 there were nearly $1,100,000,000 invested in this industry. The value of the soft-coal output of this country at the mine is about $450,000,000 a year. Of that amount over $300,000,000 goes directly to labor, and the number of miners engaged in this industry exceeds 500,000, and many hundred thousands more people are directly dependent upon it.

Now, you should not do anything to cripple or injure an industry of this magnitude, so as to lessen the opportunity of those engaged in it to provide the safeguards that the miners of this country are entitled to, so that the men who daily face the dangers and hazards underground in mining may be better protected in the future. If this bill becomes a law I honestly believe that you will put out of business a great number of the soft-coal producers of the country. I insist that there is no monopoly of the bituminous-coal industry, and that you are aiming this section at something that does not exist. You should not attempt to cripple the soft-coal industry of this country and stop the development of my State—in which State over one-third of the people are dependent upon the soft-coal industry—without great care and consideration.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AVIS. I will yield to the gentleman for a short question.

Mr. RAKER. Taking the statement that the gentleman made, that concerning the man who is producing 400 tons a day and has his regular customers and is selling at the regular price, without a monopoly, you contend that the large corporation could come in now and compel this man to set aside his regular customers and sell his coal to the corporation?

Mr. AVIS. Undoubtedly. Listen to the language of section 2. Section 2 provides—and you have adopted that section:

Nothing herein contained shall prevent persons engaged in selling goods, wares, or merchandise in commerce from selecting their own customers, except as provided in section 3 of this act.

Now, while you have provided that no mine owner shall refuse arbitrarily to sell his product to any responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies therefor, yet you have made this limitation by section 2, which qualifies the words "refuse arbitrarily."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Would the gentleman like more time?

Mr. AVIS. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. AVIS. I should like to explain a little further, in reply to the gentleman. I imagine the evil that some gentlemen anticipate is that which might exist in a community where a consumer could not purchase coal from some dealer. Now, that is not the fault of the mine owner. The mine owner sells his coal in a certain territory, and if a dealer gets the control of his output he can put up the price or refuse to sell, as he may please; and that is the very thing that, by this section, you are enabling the dealer to do, because the dealer may not be engaged in interstate commerce. You compel the mine owner, if he is engaged in interstate commerce, to sell not only for use and consumption, but to sell for the purpose of resale. Therefore, if some dealer wants to control the output in a certain section, he can go to the operator directly, if he is a responsible person, firm, or corporation, and buy his entire output, or a great part of it, in that way depriving the operator of his customers, and control that particular coal in his section, and therefore have a monopoly of it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And that particular local transaction could not be reached by this bill, because the transaction between the dealer and the consumer would be entirely intrastate and beyond the reach of any interstate provision.

Mr. AVIS. Yes. That could not be reached at all.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And therefore the very evil that they are trying to reach will not be struck at all.

Mr. AVIS. That is absolutely true. Now, when this bill was being considered I knew nothing about the intention to incorporate this section. Had I known of it, I would have appeared before the committee, and I would have had others go also. As soon as I observed this section I communicated with the coal men in my district. As I said a moment ago, in my State we have nearly 900 coal mines. We produce one-sixth of all the bituminous coal produced in this country. The value of the product is over $60,000,000 a year. I communicated with these gentlemen as soon as I learned of this section, and every single one of them has pointed out some of the evils that I have attempted to point out to you—and they realize that they are in great danger. It does seem to me that it is manifestly wrong to attempt to legislate concerning an industry as if it were a monopoly, when it is just the reverse, and when severe competition is now hurting that industry so badly that nobody can make a dollar from it. I ask any gentleman on this floor, representing any bituminous coal producing district, to point out any small miner of soft coal in his section who is earning any money to-day. The big concerns may be earning some money, but not the small ones.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to say to the gentleman that the coal operators of my district have been consulted, and they take the same position as that taken by the operators of the gentleman's State.

Mr AVIS. I am glad to hear the gentleman's statement. This provision will affect not only the operators, but also the dealers. Say I am a small operator having a mine in the State of Illinois and want to sell my coal in a certain town. I can not afford to establish a selling agency in that town. In order to get a dealer in that town to circularize and sell my coal there I have to give him that territory on commission, so that he can compete with the large dealers who are also engaged in selling coal in that town. He has procured a number of customers. This section will permit those customers to come to me directly, to come to the mine owner, and compels me, the mine owner, to sell directly to the customers whom the dealer has procured. Thereby it tends to eliminate the coal dealers of this country who have spent money and years of time in working up a trade in their respective sections. Now, is that fair to the mine owner? Is it fair to the dealer? Is it fair to anybody to put an industry in the class of monopolies when there is no monopoly of that industry—not nearly so much of a monopoly as there is of the lumber industry or of the cotton industry or of many other industries in this country?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I understand that there is a limit to this debate on this section and all amendments thereto.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. GARNER). That is correct.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I want to offer an amendment to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman can get the floor. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] controls the time.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. There certainly should not be any question of controlling the time on the introduction of amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer his amendment when the debate is exhausted.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Then there will be no more opportunity for debate.

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. I should like to introduce my amendment while the debate is going on.

Mr. CARLIN. The debate was limited by unanimous consent. We have no objection to the gentleman offering his amendment and letting it come in.

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. That is all I ask.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma may offer his amendment for information. It can only be read at this time for information. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 24, before the word "and," insert the words "or any cooperative association making purchases for distribution among its members."

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, to meet some of the evils at which this section strikes, on February 13, 1914, I introduced a bill which was referred to the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. That bill (H. R. 13354) prohibiting common carriers from owning or leasing coal lands, is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to acquire ownership of any lands underlain by coal or of any coal underlying any lands, except as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

SEC. 2. That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to lease or sell upon a royalty basis to any person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations, any lands underlain by coal, or any coal underlying any lands, whether the ownership of such lands and coal or such land or coal has been heretofore or may be hereafter acquired by said common carrier.

SEC. 3. That from and after January 1, 1916, it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to transport from any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to any other State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to any foreign country any coal or products of coal or products from land underlain by coal manufactured, mined, or produced by it or under its authority, or by any person or persons, firm or firms, corporation or corporations, to whom or to which said common carrier may have or hereafter may have leased or sold upon a royalty basis any lands underlain by coal or any coal underlying any lands, except such coal or products of coal or products from land underlain by coal as may be necessary and intended for its use in the conduct of its business as a common carrier.

The committee in charge of the bill now under consideration state the objects of this section, as follows:

This provision is new, but in view of the fact that many railroad corporations, the United States Steel Corporation, and other corporations have acquired and own, either directly or indirectly, through the medium of subsidiary corporations, vast areas of land containing coal, iron, and copper and other minerals in common use, we feel that this legislation is needed and fully justified. By its enactment into law we make it impossible for mere ownership of mines to enable the owners or those disposing of the products thereof to direct the disposal of such products into monopolistic channels of trade. It will liberate from the power of the trust every small manufacturer who is compelled to go into the open market for his raw material and every person who desires to purchase coal for use or for resale to those who desire to purchase for use or consumption, and will afford to every such manufacturer an opportunity to purchase same for cash wherever offered for sale in commerce. The section expressly forbids the mine owner or person controlling the sale of the product of the mine to arbitrarily refuse to sell such product to any responsible purchaser, and thereby prevents the mine owner or operator from giving the preference to another and rival dealer in the disposal of such product.

The independent operators to-day are not in the position which the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] has supposed, but they are in the hands of a monopoly, and are being crushed by that monopoly; and it was the independent operators of Illinois and Indiana who came before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee and demanded legislation upon this subject which would relieve them from the grasp of that monopoly which was destroying their existence and blighting their opportunities. If in their monopolistic greed they should succeed, then they would control the coal production and the price and reap a golden harvest. Aware of this situation and gravity of the condition, the independent operators appealed to Congress for protection from the injuries with which they were threatened, and to relieve that unfortunate situation I introduced the measure which I have read; and as this section will afford them additional relief, I hope it will stand and the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS] will not prevail. The facts in those two States justify their alarm, and I call the attention of the committee to them. The conditions existing in two States—Indiana and Illinois—from the statistics are shown to be as follows:

There are approximately 3,000,000 acres of coal lands in Indiana and Illinois, about 1,000,000 of which are presently available for coal operation from a commercial standpoint; the other 2,000,000 acres will not become available until the further passage of time, with improved methods, additional railroad facilities, and higher prices.

Of the 1,000,000 acres of coal available at present, it is estimated that about 160,000 acres are in Indiana and the other 840,000 acres in Illinois. It has come about that of the Indiana available coal lands, 60 per cent have come into the ownership of the railroads operating in Indiana either directly or indirectly through stock ownership in other companies or by bond holding in other companies or by financial backing by any one of various methods.

In Illinois the proportion is a little more than 60 per cent—about 66⅔ per cent. In other words, of the 840,000 acres of available coal lands in Illinois at present, approximately 541,000 acres are in the hands of railroads, besides 75,000 acres in the hands of large holders who are believed to hold the same for the railroads, a total of 616,000 acres.

Here is the way the available coal lands are distributed in Illinois: The C. & E. I. Railroad Co. has 35,000 acres of coal lands; the Illinois Central 25,000 acres; the Rock Island has 5,000; the St. Paul has 25,000; the Missouri Pacific has 10,000; the Wabash has 25,000; the Union Pacific, which does not run in Illinois at all, as I understand, has 45,000 acres in that State. But the Union Pacific, as you will remember, owns the stock control of the Chicago & Alton; and to protect the Chicago & Alton the Union Pacific has 45,000 acres in Illinois.

The Big Four lines have 90,000 acres in Illinois; the United States Steel Corporation has 75,000 acres in Illinois; the Clover Leaf has 15,000 acres; the Litchfield & Madison has 15,000; the St. Louis, Troy & Eastern has 4,000; the St. Louis & O'Fallon has 15,000; and Messrs. Corey and others, the Steel Corporation officials, have 20,000 acres. This makes a total of 541,000 acres of Illinois property out of the 840,000 available for present coal production; in other words, 64 per cent. Adding the 75,000 acres above referred to, and the total becomes 616,000 acres out of 840,000 acres; in other words, 73 per cent.

This is the real condition of the coal situation in these two States, and it warrants substantial treatment.

It is this ownership in these two States, and doubtless in the State of West Virginia the same thing exists, that is putting the independent coal operator out of commission and monopolizing the bituminous coal trade and regulating the price. When they get them once in their clutches they can control not only the output but the price as they please to fix it; and they have and will continue to do so, as all experience has demonstrated.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. I am sorry I can not yield, but I have not the time. That is the condition of the independent coal operator to-day in the States of Indiana and Illinois; and in the State of Ohio it is, I am informed, practically the same. I have no doubt it exists in the State of West Virginia and in the district from which the distinguished gentleman comes.

If there is no legislation such as is proposed here to control the sale and output of these mines, the railroads will dominate the whole production, the price, and have a complete monopoly; crowd out the independent producer and the people will be made to suffer. Regulation is demanded, and should be speedily had in order that monopoly may not punish and plunder the public.

True, as the gentleman says, the independent operator has been running at a loss not only this year but last year as well, and the cause of this will be found in the fact that the railroads are attempting to drive them out of business, and are about to succeed in doing so, and when once success has crowned their efforts in this respect, then they will remain complete masters of the situation, and the public will pay dearly for fuel. We should handle this question so as to prevent them from carrying their purpose into effect. Public good requires treatment of this matter, and, if need be, heroic, drastic treatment. Railroads buy coal lands in the States I have named, open and equip mines ready for operation, then lease them to some person, sometimes no doubt a dummy, at a royalty of 8 or 9 cents a ton. He produces, the roads haul the product to market; there may be no profit in the sale of the product; the price is beaten down, but the railroads make money out of the freight charges for transportation, and hence can afford this method of reducing prices. They do not suffer because of what they earn in hauling the product to market. But the employment of the method is crushing the independent operator, and the low price thus produced is causing him in order to compete to operate at a loss, and soon he must abandon the business and leave the field to the railroad companies. With the independent operator out of business, competition has vanished, and they have complete control of the situation; can dictate the quantity of the production and the price at which the same shall be sold. They then become the masters of the situation of this great necessity, and can dominate both our domestic and industrial consumption of fuel. This condition, for truly it is a serious condition, requires serious consideration for the adoption of some real remedy that may relieve the people from its disastrous effects, if once attempted to be carried out. This is the solution of the unfortunate condition of the independent coal operators now, and from it they need and require relief.

Once our great fuel supply passes entirely under the control of monopoly, the people will suffer as never before from the exactions of its greed as they fall prey to its insatiable avarice. [Applause.] This provision as it now stands will afford some, if not complete, protection, and I hope it will be permitted to remain as it is in order that the independent operator may have some assistance in his great effort to sustain competition, and that the whole of this great industry may not entirely pass under the control of the great railroads of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, this provision of the bill seeks to remedy, in part, at least, this evil, a remedy that the independent coal miners are demanding in at least two of these States, and I understand likewise in the State of Ohio—something that will relieve them of the grip of these monopolies that are grabbing up these coal lands, that now have two-thirds of them in three of the greatest coal-producing States in the Union, enabling them to conduct the operation of the mines and the disposal of the product as they please. The independent coal operator will be put out of business at the behest of these great monopolies, controlling the product as they do, unless we pass this or some other remedial legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask some member of the committee whether Congress has the right to legislate upon a matter of this nature. The oil producer produces his oil in the State of Oklahoma or Pennsylvania. He sells his product at the well; invariably almost it is purchased by the Standard Oil Co. I want to know whether the committee holds that that transaction, entirely within the State, is covered by this legislation?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It would not and could not be affected by this legislation. This legislation would only reach those transactions in interstate commerce.

Mr. HULINGS. I wish to say that, so far as I know the oil business, the producer of the oil sells his product at the well and the transaction is completed there.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In cases where that is true this legislation would not affect it.

Mr. HULINGS. It is almost invariably true of the oil business. When the pipe-line company, the buyer, gets the oil, it may transport it out of the State, and that would make its transaction interstate commerce and be under the jurisdiction of Congress, but the oil producer would not be within the jurisdiction of Congress and only liable to State regulation.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Undoubtedly; and the second clause of the provision provides for those in control of the product, which would reach the second man referred to provided he was engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. HULINGS. This section applies to the owner or operator of oil wells, and it is very rare indeed that the operator of an oil well ever engages in interstate commerce.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Then I want to say to the gentleman that in that case this legislation would in nowise affect him.

Mr. HULINGS. That is what I supposed. Now, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], which would define what an "arbitrary refusal" is, ought to have been adopted. But since that was cast out I propose the following amendment, which I send to the desk that it may be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 24, after the word "States," insert the following: "where the effect of such refusal shall be to restrain trade or to secure to such owner or operator monopolistic control of such products."

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I think there should be something of that sort in this bill. On the question of "arbitrary refusal," suppose it is arbitrary and does not restrain trade or does not give monopolistic control of the products. There is nothing in the refusal itself, unless it does these things, and I want to suggest to the committee that the amendment which I have proposed, I believe, carefully defines and carries out the purpose of the section.

I yield back the remainder of my time. I desire to have my amendment voted on at the proper time.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman will be voted on at its proper time.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read for information.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman offers an amendment to be read for information, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 19, after the word "products," insert the following: "in reasonable quantities."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because I am somewhat in doubt about the effect of the section as it is written in the bill. In the report of the committee—and I desire to call the attention of the committee to this report—the following language is used referring to setcion 3 of the bill:

This section, like section 2, is limited in its application to the United States and to places under the jurisdiction thereof, and has no reference to persons desiring to purchase such a product for export sale. In that case the seller is permitted to arbitrarily refuse to sell to a responsible bidder, for otherwise a foreign dealer being responsible might purchase the entire output of a mine to the detriment of manufacturers and dealers in the United States and the owner be powerless to prevent it.

If that provision as applied to coal that had been intended for foreign trade would have permitted a foreign dealer to purchase the entire output of a miner, and the latter could not, by reason of this provision in the bill, refuse to sell the whole output, then the same thing would apply to a local purchaser who undertook to purchase the entire output of the mine. The same reason that would apply to the foreign dealer who undertook to purchase the entire output of the American miner would apply to a domestic transaction, because the owner could not prevent it by reason of this section, would apply equally and with the same force to a monopolist in the United States who was a responsible purchaser, and who went to a mine owner and offered to take the entire output of the mine.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. In the first place, as I have already explained a moment ago, this has no reference to the local dealer who is selling his product within his own State. He can sell it in any way he sees proper to any person to whom he desires.

Mr. BARKLEY. I realize that.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. It applies only to persons who are selling such products in commerce, and it only applies to those who arbitrarily refuse to sell to a responsible person applying to purchase. I am unable to conceive how such a provision would result to the detriment of the small dealer. The object and purpose of the section is to prevent those who have obtained a monopoly upon vast areas of lands containing these minerals to arbitrarily refuse to furnish the products to consumers for use and consumption or to manufacturers who are engaged in competitive business with those producing or handling the products who at the same time are using such products themselves, or selling them to other and favored manufacturers engaged in a similar line of business. That is the object of it, and I do not think the small dealer could be detrimentally affected by it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I realize the object of the bill as written is to prevent monopolists from refusing to sell to independent dealers or bona fide purchasers who want to use the article, either for the manufacture of other products or for resale; but the bill as it is written does not limit it to those men, but is universal in its scope, and takes in the little dealer as well as the big dealer. I realize that Congress can not regulate a transaction that occurs wholly within a State; but suppose the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey should go into a community in another State——

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at this time. Suppose the Standard Oil Co. or some other corporation which is a monopoly should go to an independent oil well or an independent mine owner in Oklahoma and some other State and see piled up a great quantity of coal or see stored a great quantity of oil and should say, "We will offer you the market price for this whole quantity"; and suppose the mine owner or the well owner should say, "I do not want to sell it to you," and the Standard Oil Co. should reply, "But here is a provision that says you can not arbitrarily refuse to sell it to me, for I am a responsible purchaser." Then the well owner might say, "I want this to use in this community to supply my customers," but the Standard Oil Co. would reply, "You have more oil in your well and you have more coal in your mine and you can get it out; but I want this which is lying here, and you are not using it, and you have no right to refuse to sell it to me." Then the court must pass on whether that is an arbitrary refusal.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to suggest that in my judgment and opinion, if he had any good reason for refusing, it would not be an arbitrary refusal.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman three minutes more.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, my suggestion is that if a mine owner has any good reason, such as that he desires to sell to his customers or that he has contracts outstanding to be filled or any other legitimate good reason, no court would ever hold that such act would constitute an arbitrary refusal under the provisions of this section as drawn.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to say this to the gentleman. I realize the force of his argument and the value of this section, but if this amendment which I propose is adopted, then the question of the power to refuse to sell the entire output can never arise, because then the owner can say, "We will sell you a reasonable amount of this product, but we want the balance of it for the supply of our own customers," and if this amendment were adopted it would be impossible to raise the question in any court as to the power of the local miner to refuse to sell his entire output.

Mr. CARLIN. Would you not in the last analysis have to submit to the court the determination of what is a reasonable quantity?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; but it would be no more harmful to have to pass on what would be a reasonable quantity than to have to interpret the meaning of the word "arbitrary."

Mr. CARLIN. The difficulty is twofold.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. It would be easier for the court to pass on the question of whether or not a definite refusal to sell a given quantity of coal or oil was a reasonable quantity or within the discretion of the local well or mine owner than it would to go into all the facts that would make it necessary to give a different interpretation to the word "arbitrary" in every transaction. I now yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. AVIS. In connection with what the gentleman has just stated, and in connection with the reply made by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD], in which he stated, as I understood him, that section 3 would have no effect on sales within a State, where the mine owner operated in such State, under the terms of this bill, would not mine owners, if they were engaged in interstate commerce—and practically all of the mine owners are—be compelled to sell their product outside of the State to the first person who applied therefor, if he were a responsible person, firm, or corporation, to the exclusion of the people within such State?

Mr. BARKLEY. The responsible purchaser applies to the mine owner or operator anywhere in the United States or any Territory under the jurisdiction of the United States; and if the responsible purchaser from one State goes into another State and offers to purchase the entire output of a given mine or oil well, I am afraid of this section as it is written, because it leaves the possibility of prosecution in a court of justice if he refused to sell the entire output of any mine or any well, and I believe the language that I have offered will take away that possibility or that doubt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY]. [Applause.]

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment for information, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. LEVY. In my limited time I can hardly explain it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 16, after the word "owner," insert "the United States Government in Alaska."

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, my object is to throw open the coal lands of Alaska. This is the greatest monopoly in the United States to-day. The cause of business depression throughout the United States at the present time is due to too much legislation. Every time we legislate to centralize power in the hands of the Federal Government it seems the citizens of the United States have to pay more for their products. When the Hepburn bill was enacted into law coal advanced, and it has never come down in price since; and so it will be with this bill—the people will be obliged to pay increased prices. The question is solely one of supply and demand, and so it is with oil and other products. I regret exceedingly that such propositions as this should come before the Congress, because it will only increase the burdens of the people. [Applause.]

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

Mr. MURRAY of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, the clear intention of this section is to compel the producer of mine products to sell to the dealer. It would hardly be construed that any consumer or any individual citizen could buy whenever he got ready. Now to make a concrete example, my amendment provides that every "cooperative association that makes purchases for distribution among its members" shall also be included in the class which shall have the right to buy under this provision. I remember such an association in western Oklahoma attempted to buy coal and they refused them because they were not a "commercial concern," because they were not selling for profit, and they had to buy coal from West Virginia. This amendment which I offer is to permit "cooperative concerns" or societies to buy as well as dealers, and that is all there is to the amendment. I regret I am allowed no more time to urge its adoption.

Mr. CARLIN. Will the gentleman on the other side use some of his time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, we have in southeastern Kentucky over 10,000 square miles of bituminous coal territory. The western coal field of Kentucky has over 6,000 square miles, making in all in the State of Kentucky over 16,000 square miles of bituminous coal territory. There are only 14,000 square miles in the entire State of Pennsylvania—I mean of bituminous coal territory—so it can be readily seen that the State of Kentucky is vitally concerned in section 3 of this bill. Under its provisions I see nothing to prevent any of the great moneyed interests of this country from buying up under compulsion the entire coal output of southeastern Kentucky or of any other section of this great country. Section 3 says:

That it shall be unlawful for the owner or operator of any mine or for any person controlling the product of any mine engaged in selling its product in commerce to refuse arbitrarily to sell such product to a responsible person, firm, or corporation who applies to purchase such product for use.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the effect that the amount of coal to be sold ought to be limited to a reasonable amount, it seems to me, ought to prevail. When we absolutely throw open and give the great moneyed interests of this country the power to buy up, without any power to refuse, the entire coal output, it looks to me that instead of taking it out of the hands of monopolies of this great country that you are putting it into the hands of the monopolies and giving them power to control absolutely the entire coal output of the country.

Mr. AVIS. Mr. Chairman, my attention has been called to the fact that my amendment as drawn would not read connectedly with the present section as adopted a moment ago, and I therefore desire to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? The gentleman offers his amendment after what?

Mr. AVIS. I have sent it to the Clerk to be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as modified by the gentleman from West Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, amend the Ferris amendment by inserting after the word "energy" in the amendment the following: "except bituminous and semibituminous coal mines."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia——

Mr. CARLIN. I would like to know if the gentleman from Minnesota has used his time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I desire to yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARDNER. The question now is upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] to the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia, is it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. My amendment is not offered as an amendment to his, but as an independent amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is an independent amendment. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee for seven minutes.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, early in the consideration of this measure, on the 23d day of the present month, I had read from the Clerk's desk two letters from Mr. John L. Boyd, manager of the Proctor Coal Co., of Knoxville, Tenn., urging the same objections which have been so well stated by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS].

In my opinion, Mr. Boyd voices the sentiment of all of the operators of that eastern coal field of Tennessee. There is no combination in the coal fields of Tennessee among the operators, and I know of no ownership of coal lands by any of the railroad corporations of that State. The coal business has not been a profitable one, as the records will show, and to-day there is a decrease, and has been a constant decrease, in the coal output and the sale of coal in the country and in the Tennessee coal fields since the Underwood tariff bill went into operation.

The State of Tennessee has employed in its mines from 800 to 1,000 convicts digging coal, and for the first time since the State engaged in that industry they have been unable to dispose of the output from the State mines, unable to find a market, and hence have required the closing down of the mines in which the State convicts have been employed. This bill will not aid the coal industry. It will not aid any legitimate industry in this country. It is not offered for that purpose. Those who are in charge of legislation here are not seeking to develop or promote the business interests of this country. They were not elected upon a platform of that kind, and they would be untrue to the traditions of their party if they sought by legislation to promote or advance the business interests of the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Underwood tariff bill did not increase the number of pay envelopes, but it did furnish an army of 2,000,000 unemployed workingmen that had constant employment before the enactment of that bill. We were told in the consideration of that measure that it would promote American industry and extend trade, and when it failed we were then told that a currency reform was needed, and not a tariff for revenue only, to improve the condition of the working people and to promote the business of the country. We were told that same identical thing 20 years ago, when the Wilson bill was tried.

Mr. Bryan and the leaders of the Democratic Party stated that it was not the tariff, but that it was the reform of the currency—16 to 1—that was needed in order to stop depression and promote business. And having failed to carry out the promises made in the platform at Baltimore by the Underwood tariff bill, we were then given a nostrum in the shape of the currency bill. And when that failed, along with the Underwood tariff bill, we are handed the so-called antitrust legislation as a remedy for the closing of mills and for the idle mechanics, all of whom were employed before the Underwood tariff bill became a law.

And so, Mr. Chairman, in the interest of the American people, in the interest of business, and in the name of the idle, honest, deserving workingmen, I protest against this bill, which will not help, but which will depress, retard, and injure, along with the Underwood tariff bill and the currency bill, the business condition of affairs in this fair land of ours. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely trust that the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS], exempting bituminous-coal operators from the provision of this section, will not be accepted. The complaint which he makes that it will be possible for one operator to buy the product of four or five or more of the independent operators and thus monopolize the output is answered by saying that those who so buy for purposes of monopoly would be guilty of violating the Sherman antitrust law. I do not think it is fair to assume that that would be done, in order to get my friend's operators and constituents exempted from this just law, which would apply to all coal-mine operators alike.

And in addition to that, I doubt very much the right or power of Congress to exempt one set of coal operators from the operation of the law and putting another set of coal-mine operators within the law. I do not think Democrats or Republicans believe in that kind of class legislation, as it is contrary to the very spirit and genius of our institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. AVIS].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. AVIS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 32, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 24, before the word "and," insert:
"Or to any cooperative association making purchases for distribution among its members."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 24, after the word "States," insert the following: "Shall be where the effect of such refusal shall be to restrain trade or to secure to such owner or operator monopolistic control of such products."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HULINGS. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 43, noes 68.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 21, line 19, after the word "product," insert the following: "in reasonable quantities."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

Mr. LEVY. It is to modify the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. What is the modification?

Mr. LEVY. The modification is only to apply to the amendment that has been passed—the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS].

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. LEVY. Then I offer it as I offered it before.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. WEBB. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. Has not all time expired?

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired; but any gentleman can offer an amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I offer an amendment to follow section 3.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I think under the unanimous-consent agreement entered into by the committee it was agreed that all debate and all amendments should be——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia must be mistaken about that, because since the present occupant took the chair there have been several amendments offered.

Mr. MANN. All debate is closed.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN], on the ground that it is not to section 3.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] withdraws the amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment I offer comes in at the beginning of line 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 21, line 19, after the word "commerce," by inserting the words "to discriminate in price or otherwise as between persons or places for a like product delivered under similar terms and conditions."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MONDELL. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I now offer my new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MORGAN] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma moves to amend by adding a new section, to be numbered section 3a, to follow section 3, as follows:

"SEC. 3a. That any person or corporation engaged in commerce who shall by the price charged for any article, product, or commodity sold or leased, or by the terms granted or given to the purchaser or lessor of any article, product, or commodity, or by the contract, arrangement, or condition upon which any such article, product, or commodity shall be sold or leased, or by any other means, discriminate as between persons, localities, or communities, so as to give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, firm, corporation, locality, or community in any respect whatsoever, or so as to subject any particular person, firm, corporation, community, or locality to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, sections 2, 3, and 4——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. My inquiry is in reference to the agreement that we had. I am trying to find out just what was the unanimous-consent agreement about time, and whether this is in order. While this amendment is offered as a new section, it is not in the shape of an amendment, and I would like to inquire whether, under the agreement had, the gentleman is now entitled to debate it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendment is offered as a new section to the bill.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes; as a new section. I would like to explain to the Members of this House the purposes of the section. We have under section 2 prohibited discriminations in price. We have in section 3 prohibited the arbitrary refusal to sell coal, and so forth. We have in section 4 prohibited a man from selling goods, and——

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CARLIN. Section 3 has been adopted. All amendments have been defeated, and we have passed to section 6, having already adopted sections 4 and 5. Now, the gentleman offers a new section, and he does not say where or to what part of the bill it belongs. I make the point of order that it is not in order.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me suggest to the gentleman that this is the parliamentary status, as I understand it: Section 5 has been read for amendment, and of course amendments have been offered, but section 5 has not been passed beyond amendment. I have an amendment I want to offer. The gentleman would have the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. CARLIN. Section 5 was adopted, and we reverted then to section 3. We had commenced to read section 6, and then we went back to section 3.

Mr. TOWNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. When we adjourned last night there was pending an amendment to section 5. There has been no debate on section 5.

Mr. CARLIN. The gentleman is mistaken. We adopted an amendment to section 5 and concluded the section, and then we went back to the consideration of section 3.

Mr. TOWNER. Oh, no. That was on the order to revert to section 3. We have not concluded the debate on section 5 or the right to amend section 5. There has been no action of that kind. I know that, because I desire to offer an amendment of my own to section 5.

Mr. HENRY. We had concluded section 5 and had begun to read section 6, and then we returned to section 3.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yesterday an agreement was made that we would go back to section 3 as soon as the matter then pending before the committee was concluded. As soon as the matter of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DICKINSON] and the amendment thereto offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] was completed this morning we went back to section 3.

Mr. HENRY. We adopted section 6 and went back to section 3. There is no question about that.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is mistaken. We went back from the amendment pending to section 5, and after that was completed we went back to section 3.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee). This discussion of section 3 is not in order at this time. The gentleman's amendment is numbered "section 3A."

Mr. CARLIN. This is the first time I have heard that.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, everybody agrees that section 4 has been passed and that we were considering section 5. By unanimous consent section 3 was passed over. It is not in order for the gentleman from Oklahoma to offer an amendment of a new section called "section 3A" which precedes section No. 4. He might offer it as "section 4A," but he can not go back except by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. It could not be "section 4A."

Mr. ALEXANDER. "Section 5A," I should say.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman wants to offer his new section to follow section 3, at what time in the parliamentary procedure could he have offered it except at this particular moment? Was it ever in order until we had finished section 3?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the gentleman is correct. The amendment is in order at this time. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, this discussion should not be taken out of my time.

The object of the section I have offered is to put in a general section that will include unfair discriminations that are not included in sections 2, 3, and 4. In fact, if sections 2, 3, and 4 were stricken out and this section placed in the bill, it would cover, comprehend, and include all that is included in sections 2, 3, and 4. That is the kind of language we should use; that is, language that will comprehend not simply a single unfair practice, but, if possible, all unfair practices. There is not in this bill any section that includes generally unfair practices.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Did the gentleman offer this amendment to the trade-commission bill the other day?

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. I think not. I want to read section 3 of the act to regulate commerce, because this section is fashioned after that.

The first paragraph of section 3 of the act to regulate commerce provides—

> That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever; or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever.

Now, that section has been construed many times by the Interstate Commerce Commission, many times by the Supreme Court of the United States; and, more than that, it was taken from the English traffic act which was enacted in 1854, and it has been construed by the English courts. Under that section the Interstate Commerce Commission have been able to prevent many unfair discriminations and practices by the common carriers—discriminations and practices that could not have been foreseen and prohibited specifically. So, if you are in earnest in trying to control unfair practices, in trying to prevent unjust discriminations, why not insert in this bill a general provision of law that will prevent discrimination in price, in terms, by contract arrangements or agreements or otherwise, so as to give one person or locality an undue or unreasonable advantage over another, or so as to subject any person or locality to undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage.

With such a section as this in this act, as time shall go on, it will suppress many unfair practices and unjust discriminations which can not now be named. The language has been construed. The provision has been found useful in preventing unfair discriminations by common carriers. It would be useful and effective in controlling the large industrial concerns, which in the monopolistic power they possess rank with our railways. This bill prohibits only a few things. Big concerns may desist from things prohibited herein. But they may resort to other practices just as reprehensible, just as dangerous, and yet just as effective in driving out competition. To my mind it would be exceedingly unwise to pass this bill without one section that is drawn so as to make all business practices which are unjust and unreasonable unlawful. It is useless to close a few of the avenues which lead to monopolistic control of business without an attempt to close all. For as long as there is one way open those seeking undue advantage over others will find it. No legitimate objection can be urged against this section which I have proposed. It makes it unlawful for any person through the price charged or the terms given or the contract entered into to discriminate so as to give any person, locality, or community any undue or unreasonable advantage over any other person or community, or so as to subject any other person or community to any undue prejudice or disadvantage. Can there be any objection to this? Is not this just the sum and substance, the very heart of what you are attempting to do? Is it not the practice or method that gives one an undue advantage over another that you want to prevent? This is my understanding of what you are attempting. If I am correct, then the new section which I have offered should be adopted.

Mr. WEBB. It strikes me that the gentleman's amendment ought not to have been offered as section 3a, but as a substitute for sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. MORGAN of Oklahoma. That is the way I intended it, but I could not get it in that way. If this is adopted, I shall move to strike out sections 2, 3, and 4.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman's amendment is a sort of omnium gatherum in which he undertakes to cover the practices condemned in sections 2, 3, and 4. I believe the House is fairly well satisfied with these three sections as we have adopted them, and that it will prefer them to the amendment of my friend from Oklahoma, and I therefore hope his amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to section 5.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 22, line 19, after the word "forbidden," insert the words "or declared to be unlawful."

Mr. CARLIN. In order to get the matter straightened out, I make the point of order that section 5 has been passed and that therefore the amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that section 5 was completed yesterday, and that the next section to be considered is section 6. After section 5 had been completed the chairman of the committee requested that we return to section 3. Therefore the Chair thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman comes too late.

Mr. TOWNER. If the Chair will pardon me just a moment, I think the Chair is entirely right in his statement; but there was an agreement stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] yesterday that we should return to section 3 after we had disposed of any pending amendments that we had under consideration last evening. This morning we did dispose of the pending amendments to section 5, and then——

Mr. MANN. Under the circumstances I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have the privilege of offering his amendment. There was a misunderstanding.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to offer the amendment which has been read from the Clerk's desk. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TOWNER. I call the attention of the committee to this amendment. I think they ought to accept it. I move to add the words "or declared to be unlawful" for the reason that in some of the sections of this bill certain things are forbidden and in others they are declared unlawful. If the gentleman will turn, for instance, to section 8, he will find that in that section certain things are forbidden. The language of section 3 is that it shall be unlawful for the owners, and so forth. I offer this amendment for the purpose of perfecting the language of the text, because certain things are forbidden and certain things are declared to be unlawful, and this section ought to be made to apply to both.

Mr. WEBB. Does not the gentleman think anything that is forbidden in law is unlawful?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know whether the courts would so hold or not.

Mr. WEBB. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. TOWNER. But that is not the customary language, and it certainly ought not to be left in doubt. Why do you hesitate to accept an amendment which will remove all possibility of doubt? Do you want the doubt to continue?

Mr. WEBB. The committee think that anything which is forbidden is declared to be unlawful.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the committee never thought about it at all.

Mr. WEBB. I am stating it now.

Mr. TOWNER. They have not given it any consideration. There are certain things in this law that are forbidden, and there are certain other things that are declared to be unlawful. You want this section to apply to both. Why do you not say so?

Mr. WEBB. Everything that is declared to be unlawful in this bill or in the antitrust law is forbidden by law.

Mr. TOWNER. Very well, if that is the gentleman's attitude.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States under any of the antitrust laws there shall have been rendered a final judgment or decree to the effect that a defendant has or has not entered into a contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce, or has or has not monopolized, or attempted to monopolize or combined with any person or persons to monopolize, any part of commerce, in violation of any of the antitrust laws, said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute in favor of or against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of or against any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

Whenever any suit or proceeding in equity is hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States, under any of the antitrust laws, the statute of limitations in respect of each and every private right of action, arising under such antitrust laws, and based, in whole or in part, on any matter complained of in said suit or proceeding in equity, shall be suspended during the pendency of such suit or proceeding in equity.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if we may have some agreement as to time on this section, and if he has any idea of what time he would like to have?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I am not aware just how many gentlemen desire to offer amendments, but I think we had better proceed for a few minutes until we know how many amendments will be offered.

Mr. MANN. If I may have the attention of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], I wish to make a suggestion. To-morrow is Decoration Day, and the House does not meet. There are a number of Members who want to leave the House fairly early this afternoon to take trains to go out of town in connection with the exercises of to-morrow. I think every Member wants to be here when section 7 comes up. Can we get some kind of an agreement as to when we will quit to-night?

Mr. MURDOCK. We will not be able to get through with section 7 to-night.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the committee in charge of this bill desires to make as much headway as possible. We have lost two days out of this week on account of the death of Senator Bradley and the fact that Memorial Day is to-morrow. I regret that we can not have a night session to-night, but we have to take into consideration the temper of the Members in this trying weather and the circumstances that require many to go away to-night for Memorial Day. I will agree that when we finish section 6 this afternoon I will ask unanimous consent to adjourn until Monday at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. It does not require unanimous consent; that is covered by the rule.

Mr. WEBB. With the additional notice that we are to have a session Monday night and Tuesday night if we do not finish the bill by that time.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman does not mean to go into the discussion of the bill under the five-minute rule on Monday night?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; I know that the rule under which we are considering this bill only provides that we shall have night sessions during general debate.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman's purpose is that when we finish section 6 we will adjourn?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. And not go into section 7?

Mr. WEBB. That is the understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does not the gentleman think that we would make more headway and better progress if we come in earlier in the day and do away with the night session? Everybody realizes that night service is hard on the Members, and if we could meet at 10 o'clock we could make much better headway than we could in the evening.

Mr. WEBB. I am perfectly willing to meet at 10 o'clock, but the gentleman heard the murmur of noes all over the hall, which shows that they are not willing to accept his suggestion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, at this season of the long session, since I have been here, it has been customary on bills of importance to meet at 11 o'clock and very often run without a recess into a night session. I think we have reached that stage at this session where we ought to do it a part of the time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. But we are to be here all summer, are we not?

Mr. MANN. I do not know, but I do not think we will. I think we will adjourn Congress in July. I may be mistaken; but we will not adjourn in July if we spend a month on one bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think, to save his reputation as a prophet, the gentleman had better make it August 1.

Mr. WEBB. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Minnesota if we can not agree upon some limit to the time for discussion of this section 6.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think we had better run along a few minutes. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 5, strike out the words "or has not"; in line 7, same page, strike out the words "or has not"; in line 14, same page, strike out the words "or against"; in line 16, same page, strike out the words "or against."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would change the section so that the decree or judgment would only be binding on any combination that may be found to be in restraint of trade and not in its favor. This section in effect provides that in the event a judgment is entered it can be pleaded by the offending party not only against but also in its favor. I think that is entirely unjust, and it seems to me that it is clearly unconstitutional. It does not seem to me that there can be any argument in favor of such a proposition.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. What effect does the gentleman's amendment have on the proposition that the judgment shall be conclusive as to the violation of the law as to all parties?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Under the amendment the decree would still be conclusive against an illegal combination, but it would not be conclusive in its favor. It seems to me that it should not be evidence in an action brought by a private party that has never been in court. To illustrate: The Government brings a suit, and it is prosecuted to judgment. If the judgment is against the Government, it absolutely relieves the corporation from any suit by a private party for damages, though this private suitor may never have known of the action nor have had any opportunity to introduce evidence or be heard.

Mr. BARTLETT. Provided the judgment is in favor of the corporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes. It can not possibly be legal to deprive a person of his rights in this way. To illustrate: I was told that in Philadelphia a refinery was wrecked by illegal acts in restraint of trade committed by the Sugar Trust. The Sugar Trust was sued by the Government, but the Government lost the suit. If this section had been in force the refinery which had been wrecked, completely ruined by this trust, would not have been able to recover at all. The refinery brought a suit, which was settled out of court for something like $2,000,000.

Now, it seems to me that there is no sense or justice in the position assumed by the committee in this instance. It is doubtful whether you can make the judgment conclusive against an illegal combination or in favor of a party that has not been in court, but you certainly can not bind parties who have had no opportunity to litigate a question.

Mr. BARTLETT. If I understand the purport and effect of the gentleman's amendment, it is that the judgment in favor of the alleged violator of the law shall not be considered conclusive in a suit between him and some other party; in other words, that it shall not take a man's property without due process of law or denying him equal protection of the law.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It would confiscate every claim that a private party had in case there was a judgment in favor of the corporation.

Mr. BARTLETT. This is in the interest of the individual and not in the interest of the corporation.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Exactly.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Minnesota to a clerical error in his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Minnesota be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman wishes a judgment to stand as against the defendant in the case. Now, in line 14, therefore, he does not wish the word "against" stricken out, but, as the Clerk has it, the word "against" is stricken out.

I have examined the copy. In line 14 the words which I am satisfied the gentleman wishes to have stricken out are the words "in favor of or."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I admit the error, and I ask to be permitted to amend it by changing line 14.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I will read it, if the House will permit and the gentleman yields, as it should be:

Line 14, strike out the words "in favor of or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman whether in the case of a suit brought at law against a corporation for damages under the antitrust law, as it exists to-day, such defendant corporation would have the constitutional right to demand a jury trial in the law action?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Certainly; it would.

Mr. SCOTT. Then how can we, by legislation, make a decree in equity conclusive evidence against that corporation?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think we can.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the gentleman's amendment seek to do that very thing?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think so. My amendment seeks to avoid making a judgment conclusive against a private party.

Mr. SCOTT. But as against a corporation. Having tried the case before a court in equity, it is deprived of the right to jury trial in the law action for damages which the Constitution guarantees. The gentleman has substituted a court of equity for the constitutional jury.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, personally I will be perfectly willing to have this section stricken out, because I do believe that this section, instead of being an advantage, is going to be a disadvantage in many ways. I believe that rather than make a provision of this kind we ought to permit the evidence introduced in a Government suit to be admissible in any private suit, because then the two suits could proceed at the same time, and they could proceed while the witnesses were living, while there would be some interest in the prosecution, rather than years afterwards, when perhaps many of the parties who might be used as witnesses would be dead.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is some doubt as to what the amendment does. What is it designed to do?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The design is to change this section so that a judgment in favor of a corporation declared to be an unlawful monopoly shall not bar a private suit by an individual that may be injured by that monopoly.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to explain to the House this particular section, as there will probably be other amendments offered to it. The President in his message delivered to the House on January 20, 1914, among other recommendations, had this to say:

> There is another matter in which imperative considerations of justice and fair play suggest thoughtful remedial action. Not only do many of the combinations effected or sought to be effected in the industrial world work an injustice upon the public in general; they also directly and seriously injure the individuals who are put out of business in one unfair way or another by the many dislodging and exterminating forces of combination. I hope that we shall agree in giving private individuals who claim to have been injured by these processes the right to found their suits for redress upon the facts and judgments proved and entered in suits by the Government where the Government has upon its own initiative sued the combinations complained of and won its suit, and that the statute of limitations shall be suffered to run against such litigants only from the date of the conclusion of the Government's action. It is not fair that the private litigant should be obliged to set up and establish again the facts which the Government has proved. He can not afford, he has not the power, to make use of such processes of inquiry as the Government has command of. Thus shall individual justice be done while the processes of business are rectified and squared with the general conscience.

That is the recommendation made by the President. The Committee on the Judiciary in considering this question did not depend alone on the recommendation of the Executive, but we sought information from different sources. We examined bills introduced in Congress pertaining to this subject, and among other bills we found one introduced in the House by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and one in the Senate by Senator LA FOLLETTE, in which we found this language:

> SEC. 12. That whenever in any suit or proceeding, civil or criminal, brought by or on behalf of the Government under the provisions of this act a final judgment or decree shall have been rendered to the effect that a defendant, in violation of the provisions of this act, has entered into a contract, combination in form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, or has monopolized or attempted to monopolize or combined with any person or persons to monopolize any part of the trade or commerce among the several States or with foreign nations, the existence of such illegal contract, combination, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or of such attempt or conspiracy to monopolize, shall to the full extent to which the facts and issues of fact or law were litigated and to the full extent to which such fact, judgment, or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the Government and such person, constitute as against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts and be conclusive as to the same issues of law in favor of any other party in any other proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of this act.

The amendment incorporated in the bill is that provision modified, but not substantially affected, except in the one particular to which the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota pertains.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. PROUTY. In the bill that the gentleman has just read, and also in the recommendation of the President, it only anticipates that the defendant in that suit would be estopped. Has the gentleman any authority or advice on how that estoppel could be made binding as against a man who was not a party to a suit or privy to it?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I desire to be heard on that question.

Mr. PROUTY. Has the gentleman any authority on that question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have no direct authorities on the proposition, because this is a new proposition, but I desire to be heard upon it. The purpose was set forth in the President's recommendation. In endeavoring to follow out that recommendation, which your committee deemed a good one, and in searching for information from different sources, we found the ideas embodied in the President's message incorporated in a proposed bill by the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT, and we did not hesitate to use that provision in our bill. In our tentative bill we used it practically as it was written in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, but we found, after we had placed the bill in the limelight, that the one criticism that was made against that provision was that it was unfair to permit the judgment to be used in favor of one of the parties to the suit and to refuse to permit the judgment to be used as to the same facts and upon the same questions of law in favor of the other party. And in the interest of justice and common fairness, believing that it was a sound proposition of law and justice to do so, we modified it so as to make the decree conclusive as to both parties.

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. For a question.

Mr. PROUTY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the provisions of this bill are the same as those of the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LENROOT?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I said that the general proposition was the same, and I read the provision of the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin, showing that the original proposition in our tentative bill was substantially the same, but we modified it when we made it applicable to both the parties.

Mr. PROUTY. Well, in Mr. LENROOT's bill it would only be binding on one party to the suit.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The President in his message only suggested and recommended that it be made binding upon the corporation and in Mr. LENROOT's bill he provided that it should be only binding upon the corporation, but your committee, after having hearings on the subject, after listening to criticisms of that provision, found that it was subject to criticism if we made the decree applicable in favor of one party and not applicable against him in case the decision was adverse to the Government, and in the interest of what we believe to be justice and fair play we modified it accordingly, and neither Mr. LENROOT nor the President is responsible for that modification, but your committee is responsible for it.

Mr. PROUTY. What I really desired to ask the gentleman was whether he has any authority that would show under any circumstances——

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman will permit me, I will explain, and I expect to submit not a specific authority, for never in the history of legislation, in my knowledge, has this particular proposal been submitted to us. We are dealing with a new question——

Mr. PROUTY. I agree with the gentleman in that.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. My purpose is to justify it not only in morals but in law. Now, what are the facts; what is the situation? You take the case of the Standard Oil Co. and the American Tobacco Co. case. After years of litigation they were terminated, and there were volumes of proof showing that they committed acts which were held by the court to be unlawful, and it was shown in the testimony that by such unlawful means those great combinations had destroyed the business of hundreds of competitors. If the statute of limitation——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Arkansas may have five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield at this time?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this time. I desire to make a general statement, and if I have time then I will yield. These combinations were declared to be unlawful and being unlawful were liable in treble damages under section 7 of the Sherman law, and yet private persons injured were absolutely without remedy because their causes of action were barred by the statute of limitation. The second provision of this section saves the statute of limitation to these litigants. Now, upon what principle can this lgeislation be justified? I desire to say that the only principle upon which the antitrust legislation, the Sherman Act, the supplemental acts thereto, and this act can be justified is upon the broad ground of public policy. The only authority, the only reason, that justifies the Government in interfering in the affairs of private citizens or in the affairs of corporations incorporated under laws of the several States is based upon the principle of public policy or for the general good, the general welfare. When one of these suits is brought against a combination alleged to be an unlawful combination the public money is expended in large sums in order to maintain that suit. For what purpose? For the general good, for the good of all the citizens, for the good of the entire people of the United States, based upon the broad principle of public policy. The courts have upheld this character of legislation which has been assailed from every quarter, bitterly contested. The highest court of this land has upheld the Sherman law, and has upheld the statutes of the States adopted to accomplish the same purpose in the States, always upon the ground that the Government has the right to inquire into and to deal with and prohibit and regulate the affairs of individuals and of corporations upon the ground of public policy.

Mr. SCOTT. May I ask the gentleman a question at this point?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Not at this point; I will yield to the gentleman later. Now, if that be true, then, when one of these suits is instituted, carried on by the Government at the public expense, it is carried on in the interest of the American people and of every citizen. It is true those directly concerned, affected, or injured by the corporation, may have a greater interest than other citizens, but it is in the interest of the people generally, the whole people, the Government representing the people, representing all the citizens; and, so far as that decree as between the Government and the corporation is concerned, I do not believe that anyone can question the justice or the right of making it conclusive. Such decree imports absolute verity, binding upon the Government and the party to the suit, both as to findings of fact and questions of law determined in the suit. Does anybody question that? That is the common rule of law applied to all judgments and decrees of all courts of record. That is an old doctrine of the law. Then what do we propose in this case? The word "conclusive" seems to have created confusion in the minds of a great many persons. What are we seeking to do? We are not giving to that decree any element or quality except such as attaches to every other decree. A decree or judgment of a court of record imports upon its face absolute verity. Such decree is binding upon all parties to the suit, and can not be attacked collaterally. What we are attempting to do in this case is to apply that decree, with its usual effect, with its usual force, in another suit wherein one of the parties was not a party to the original suit.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield right at that point?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I would prefer to finish.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would like to get an answer right at that point. Does the gentleman mean against that defendant, or against anybody else? The gentleman certainly does not want that decree to estop parties to enter suit where the defendant is not a party, does he?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I do not know that I understand the gentleman's question.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I can very well understand why if it is a suit against the United States Steel Corporation, where the corporation in a suit by the United States has been decreed to be in a trust in violation of the terms of the antitrust laws should be excluded in another suit by another party against that corporation, but I can not understand where a party can be estopped if they are different parties to the controversy.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, I will try to explain that to the gentleman. I must decline to yield now, because I have not the time. I am endeavoring to state my position. This is a new question, based upon new principles, and I am endeavoring to justify it, and I will be glad to permit interruptions after I have stated the proposition.

Now, is there any objection to using it against a convicted corporation when a private litigant brings a suit against such corporation? Is there any valid objection to making that decree binding upon the defendant corporation although this private individual seeking redress was not a party to the suit brought by the Government against the corporation for violations of the Sherman Act, in which the corporation is adjudged guilty by final decree of the court?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I would say, none whatever. So far, so good.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I want to call your attention to a provision in the Constitution that provides that in a suit at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I have that marked, and I shall discuss it later. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon my going into that question now.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I wanted to call your attention to that in connection with an equity suit.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Then I assume, in response to my last question, that there is no serious, at least no legal, objection to making that decree binding upon the defendant corporation found guilty of violations of the antitrust laws, although in the new suit a private litigant, who was not a party to the Government suit, is the complainant in an action for damages against the convicted corporation. Now, that is what was recommended by the President, that is what was provided in Mr. LENROOT's bill, that is what was provided by your committee in its tentative bill on the subject, and the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] seeks to restore the bill in that respect to the form in which it was originally drafted. The only serious criticism that we ever had from any source as to this particular section proposed was the criticism that it was made binding in favor of a private litigant against the corporation, but not in favor of the corporation when the facts and law were found to be in favor of the corporation. It was argued that in that case to refuse to make it binding also against the individual was unjust, unjustifiable in law, and grossly unfair.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. CULLOP. My question is this: Supposing a collusive suit was brought and the defendant won on the issue, then is every outsider barred from any further suit? According to this language he is.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I understand the question, and I will answer it. But I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me until I state my position fully.

The gentleman from Indiana asks as to the effect of this provision if a collusive suit is brought. My answer to that proposition is that if the time ever comes in this Government when any Attorney General will enter into collusive suits with corporations and combinations engaged in unlawful acts, it will be an evil day for our Republic, a day when every statute will become useless and justice will become a mockery. I am not prepared to believe that any such condition will arise or can exist, or has existed, under any administration in the past, or will exist under any administration in the future. I have too much faith in the integrity of our institutions to be alarmed by any such suggestion as that.

Now, what do we propose, then? We propose, in the first place, in one of the sections of this bill, to give every private suitor who has a cause of action against a combination acting in violation of law triple damages under this bill, as he is given triple damages under section 7 of the Sherman Act against the offending corporation. But the remedy given in section 7 of the Sherman Act has been of little value and practically useless in the past, because the individual, the small man, and the small concern, were utterly helpless in their efforts to confront in the courts these great and powerful corporations, and the result was that the remedy provided in the Sherman Act has been of little efficiency, and the remedy provided in this bill for similar offenses, for violation of its provisions, may be of little efficiency unless we supplement it and lend to private litigants the aid of this great Government, that has the means, the opportunity, and the force, and the machinery to cope with the greatest and most powerful corporations and combinations in the country.

Mr. SUMNERS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Just for a short question.

Mr. SUMNERS. It is not clear to my mind how an individual claiming to be injured by a corporation could profit by the judgment already rendered in favor of the Government.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will endeavor to make that clear. Not only do we allow the judgment to be offered in evidence in such suits, but we provide that from the day that the Government institutes its suit until the termination of that suit the statutes of limitations are suspended in favor of the party injured by the wrongful acts of the corporation. After the termination of that suit, if by the judgment of a Federal court the defendant corporation is found to be guilty of an unlawful combination, the party injured, with the proofs furnished by the Government in that suit of wrongful acts—it may be pertaining to this very litigant—can institute a suit, offer the judgment or decree against the corporation in obtaining his judgment, and the court will then assess threefold damages. It is as simple as can be.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SUMNERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended 10 minutes. I want to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUMNERS. Now, section 5 provides that triple damages may be rendered in favor of the person who has been injured by an act, not by a trust, but by an act done in violation of the antitrust law. Now, when he comes to bring his suit, I do not see how he could avail himself of the judgment already rendered declaring the defendant to be a trust, unless the facts in the case in which the defendant was found to be a trust involved the particular individual suing.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. The gentleman from Texas is mistaken, badly mistaken.

Mr. SUMNERS. I am asking for information; that is all.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If no fact in the Government suit related in any way to the party's case, there would still be this advantage: It is a condemned corporation under the law, and he would not have to prove it was acting unlawfully in restraint of trade. The Government has already established that fact, and it is conclusive against defendant corporation. All that the private litigant is required to do under that section as proposed in the bill is to introduce his decree, which is conclusive against the corporation, showing that that corporation has been condemned as an unlawful combination acting in restraint of trade, and then produce the facts to show that he has been damaged by it and to what extent. What better advantage could you afford a litigant than to enable him to avail himself of the benefit of the Government's decree in that way? Now, this has been criticized, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is responsive to that criticism, on the ground that we have no right to make it binding upon the individual or litigant not a party to the Government suit, and also a constitutional question has been raised to the effect that to make the decree binding against the private litigant not a party to such original suit is tantamount to denying him the right of a trial by jury.

Now, I want to answer the arguments on each of those propositions. In the first place, as a matter of practical effect, the legislation is largely against the offending corporation and chiefly in favor of the injured litigant who is complaining of the wrongful acts of the corporation. And even if in some few cases the litigant might be deprived of a portion of his rights or of a portion of his evidence by a decree in favor of a corporation, how few would be the number of cases and what an infinite advantage is given to litigants in general upon the broad proposition that the Government suit was brought by the Government for the benefit of all of its citizens, and that when a decree has been obtained enables all of its citizens to take advantage of the work and of the decree of the Government in private suits. But as a matter of practical effect, assuming as I do that the men in high position in this Government will act honestly, will not go into collusion with any unlawful combination, I can see no great danger to private litigants in providing that the decree shall be conclusive against private litigants in cases wherein corporations have been charged with being unlawful combinations in restraint of trade and have been adjudged not guilty.

What possibility would there be for any individual to maintain a suit when this great Government of ours, the greatest in the world, has exhausted its resources to prove that a combination is unlawful and has failed to do it? Do you think there is much in their argument? What private litigant could undertake it after the Government, with its resources, its money, its detectives, its Secret Service men, its opportunities for gaining information, its bureaus—with all those things at its command had exhausted its resources and failed? What private individual would stand any chance or have any opportunity to accomplish more than the Government did, and in consequence lose anything by this provision?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I decline at this moment. I want to answer these legal arguments.

Now, it has been contended that this provision as drawn interferes with due process of law and with the right to trial by jury. I have been asked to give my authority. I can not cite any decisions directly in point, because it is a new proposition; and, besides, I have not had any opportunity to run down decisions on other questions that may have a bearing on this subject. But I have the Constitution here; I have the provisions in the Constitution; and I confidently assert that there is no principle in the Federal Constitution that is violated by this provision.

Now, I want to read you the fifth amendment to the Constitution. It reads:

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Is that provision in the Constitution violated by what we propose? The corporation is not proceeding against an individual. An individual is proceeding against a corporation. Get that distinction clearly in mind. In what we propose a corporation is not proceeding against an individual for the purpose of depriving him of either life, liberty, or property, but the individual is asserting his legal rights against the corporation; and that principle would be applicable to the corporation sued, but not to the individual that is instituting a suit and asserting a right against the corporation for torts committed by it.

Now, in maintaining or trying suits what is the rule? The legislative body makes the rules of evidence, prescribes what may be evidence, and the things that may be legally admitted in evidence in a trial by the courts; and there is nothing in this amendment violative of the right of trial by jury, and no provision of the Constitution is violated by what we propose in this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks to proceed for 10 minutes more. Is there objection?

Mr. HULINGS. I object, Mr. Chairman. The gentleman has had three or four extensions of time, but has not had the courtesy to allow any interruptions.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] objects.

[Mr. BEALL of Texas addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, we have now spent an hour discussing this amendment and the section, and I want to know if we can not come to some agreement as to the limit of time that is to be spent upon this section. I shall move to rise when we finish this section.

Mr. MANN. We want 45 minutes on this side if we can have it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and amendments thereto may be closed in 1 hour and 10 minutes, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and the remainder by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending section and amendments thereto close in 1 hour and 10 minutes, 45 minutes to go to the gentleman from Minnesota and the remainder of the time to the gentleman from North Carolina. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the first paragraph of section 6 is so clearly unconstitutional as it stands that there ought to be no discussion or argument about it in a body composed largely of lawyers, as is this House. This section provides that a third party may be estopped by a decree or judgment rendered in a case in which he was not a party and had no opportunity of appearing nor any notice served upon him whatever. If there is any proposition of law that is well settled, it is that no person can be estopped or concluded by a decree or judgment which is rendered in a case to which he is not a party, or where he has not had his day in court, or of which he has not had notice. And yet all of these three propositions are controverted by section 6 as it now stands. It gives the third party no day in court, no opportunity to be heard, and it provides for no notice upon him whatever. It is not strange that the gentleman from Arkansas has said that this is entirely new. It certainly is new to jurisprudence in this country.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is new to assert such a proposition, but the other proposition is old enough that a man can not be deprived of his property without due process of law or giving him a day in court.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That proposition is as old as the law in this country. The provision of the Constitution that forbids it is found in the fifth amendment, which provides that no man shall be deprived of his property or rights without due process of law, and yet they seek to provide in this section that he shall be deprived of his property without any due process of law, without even notice of hearing or any day in court. So far as that particular matter is concerned there need be no discussion. When it comes to the question of fairness and justice in the matter I think it is fair that the defendant corporation, who has had its day in court, should be estopped, while the third party, who has had no opportunity to be heard, ought not to be estopped or concluded.

It can be reasonably said that the defendant had introduced all of the evidence he had on the subject; that he has had every opportunity that could be given him in another case; that it would not change the result or the decree if the case were heard over again as to him, but the third party, the private corporation or individual, as it might be, which was not a party to the original case, has never had any opportunity whatever. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] said, as I understood him, that there had been no case where the Government had failed, and that no other corporation or private individual has succeeded in a suit on the same facts or a similar case.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Oh, I think the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I would be glad to have the gentleman correct me if I have misstated what he said.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I said the cases were rare.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I was about to say that in the well-known Knight case against the Sugar Trust the Government did fail because of incompetence or carelessness on the part of the Government attorney. There was no other reason. The suit ought to have been won. Subsequently another party or corporation, I forget which, did obtain judgment for something like $2,000,000 against the Sugar Trust for violation of the Sherman antitrust law, and it was stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL], who just preceded me and who made as able an argument as could be made for this provision, that the third party would not be estopped unless the facts were similar. Unfortunately we have a provision in this section that makes the estoppel as complete as it would be against the Government, and that provision is:

Said judgment or decree shall, to the full extent to which such judgment or decree would constitute in any other proceeding an estoppel as between the United States and such defendant, constitute in favor of or against such defendant conclusive evidence of the same facts, and be conclusive as to the same questions of law in favor of or against any other party in any action or proceeding brought under or involving the provisions of any of the antitrust laws.

The rules of estoppel apply in the same way if the Government failed to make out its case, because it did not produce sufficient evidence when it had it; then the third party would be estopped as conclusively as the Government, and that is exactly what the section says.

I wish to speak for a moment with reference to the objection raised by my colleague, Mr. SCOTT. I am not entirely clear as to whether this section is constitutional even as against the defendant corporation, but I am inclined to think that the provision might stand in that respect. It is true that the original decree in favor of the Government might have been rendered in an equity suit. The suit commenced by a third party might be a suit for damages commenced in a case at law, in which either party is entitled to a trial by jury. But the trial by jury will still go on as to the extent of the damages, as to the amount of the judgment which might be rendered, and this decree is only rendered conclusive as to the findings of fact, and the conclusions of law with reference to the existence of a trust and the violation of the Sherman law. But I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] in saying that even as to that matter the section is of doubtful constitutionality, and I have some doubt as to whether it will be of very much benefit to the private individual in any event. He can always avail himself of the search which the Government has made in order to obtain the evidence. He can use, presumably, and obtain the same evidence which the Government has used, even though the decree be not made conclusive in his favor; but if it is possible, if it can constitutionally be made conclusive in his favor, I would be in favor of having it done. In any event, the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] ought to be agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PROUTY].

Mr. PROUTY. Mr. Chairman, the question here involved is a very simple one, if carefully analyzed. Article V of the amendment to the Constitution which binds the Federal Government expressly provides that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law. Every court that has ever passed upon that provision of the Constitution—and there are some 60 or 70 cases in the United States Supreme Court—has held that no one can be deprived of his property unless he has had his day in court. "Due process of law" has been held again and again to mean that he must have his day in court, by notice and otherwise.

The second proposition I presume no one will question—that the rights involved in a suit at law or claim for damages against anyone is property within the meaning of the Constitution. Therefore we can safely say that the Constitution provides that no one shall be deprived of his rights in a lawsuit except by due process of law. Keeping this in mind, just see where this section as it now stands would lead us. Suppose I had a case against the Standard Oil Co., as I did at one time, in which I alleged conspiracy to defraud, conspiracy in restraint of trade, under the Sherman antitrust law. Suppose, now, when I got that case ready to be submitted to the jury, and the Standard Oil Co. should come into court with a case that had been tried down in New Jersey, in an equity proceeding, and should say, "You can not recover anything from us, because that question was adjudicated in an equity proceeding down in New Jersey." I would say, "Why, I never heard of that case; I do not know anything about it; and how can I be estopped, how can I be deprived of my rights against the Standard Oil Co. in a proceeding to which I never was a party and of which I knew nothing?"

If the theory of these gentlemen is correct, a man can be absolutely deprived of his right to property without any knowledge of it whatever. There is the second provision that is just as clear when carefully analyzed, and that is the sixth article of the amendment to the Constitution, which provides, in substance, that a man shall be entitled to trial by jury in all cases in which the amount involved is more than $20. Just take the case I have now named. Suppose I had started suit against the Standard Oil Co. in the city of Des Moines and was asking a trial by jury upon the question of facts, the prime central fact of all those cases, and that is whether there was a conspiracy, whether there is a contract in restraint of trade. Suppose I were ready to try that case before a jury in the city of Des Moines. The Standard Oil Co. would say, "Why, that identical question was determined in an equity case down in New Jersey three years ago." I would reply, "It can not be possible that I am going to be deprived of the right of trial by jury on a question of fact when I am guaranteed that right by the Constitution of the United States." But the judge on the bench would reply to me and say, "Why, Congress has passed a law saying that the decree in equity shall be conclusive evidence"—not, as the gentleman from Texas said, presumptive evidence, but conclusive evidence, and conclusive evidence of the law as well.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. I notice the last paragraph of section 4, in line 19, provides that in the event the gentleman should bring suit believing he had been injured by some combination in violation of law and thereafter the Federal Government, by the Attorney General, should institute a suit, instantly the gentleman's right of action would be suspended until the Federal court had decided the suit of the Federal Government, would it not?

Mr. PROUTY. Yes; I think so, under the terms of this act.

Mr. SISSON. The only thing reserved to the gentleman would be his right of action, because the statute of limitations would not run against that right in the event the Government recovered.

Mr. PROUTY. That part of the section, I think, is all right and is not subject to criticism.

Mr. SISSON. That part is all right, but does the gentleman believe that his rights in the court should be determined upon the questions raised by the Attorney General of the United States?

Mr. PROUTY. Why, certainly not; the Constitution expressly prohibits it. In other words, the Attorney General could go in and prevent my having a trial before a jury.

Mr. SISSON. That is the point I had in mind.

Mr. PROUTY. By instituting a proceeding in equity and having the case tried.

Mr. SISSON. That is the point I had in mind, that the Attorney General, if he was disposed to do so—we would not charge that of any particular Attorney General—might cook up a case which would directly defeat the rights of every individual if he had been injured.

Mr. PROUTY. While I do not say that, but there was a purpose on the part of the men who adopted this constitutional provision that every man should have the right of a trial by jury. It is well known and everybody knows who has read jurisprudence that there is a tendency in the courts to act along certain lines dangerous to popular rights; and one thing that all countries, not alone the United States, have had to do was to assert their rights in order to protect themselves against the courts by having the right to appeal to a jury of their peers; and we put into the first amendments we adopted to the Constitution a provision that no man could be deprived of the right of a trial by jury; yet, if this law passes, that provision has been made absolutely nugatory. The question of fact and of law both have been determined in a proceeding in equity. Now, is there any doubt about that? Starting with the section—

> That whenever in any suit or proceeding in equity hereafter brought by or on behalf of the United States under any of the antitrust laws there shall have been rendered a final judgment—

And so forth.

Then it ends by saying that it shall be binding both for and against the defendant and be conclusive as to the same questions of law and conclusive as to the same questions of fact. Now, if that does not violate the sixth article of the Constitution, which requires trial by jury, then I do not read correctly. Now, you can not say any more than this. When I stood up here and asked the gentleman—who is an able lawyer, as I know he is—whether he had found any precedents in any decisions of the United States courts that had held that a man could be absolutely barred and stopped by a lawsuit to which he was not a party, he said that he had not found one, and I was not surprised, and I listened to his speech, first for 10 minutes and then for 20 minutes and then an extension, and he has not called our attention to a single decision, and I venture the assertion that he can not find one. Now, the recommendation of the President does not correspond with this bill. He only asked Congress to pass a bill that will bind the defendant in the equity suit. While I have some doubt on that phase, as has been suggested here, yet there is a reason why a defendant corporation might be bound by a determination of a case in which it was a defendant, but there is no court who has ever held that a man was bound by a case to which he was not a party.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment already pending offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SCOTT].

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I endeavored to be permitted to ask the chairman of the committee a question in reference to the report of the committee. I find on page 14 of the report this language:

> And that when such decree or judgment is so offered it shall be conclusive evidence of the same facts and be conclusive as to the same questions of law as between the parties in the original suit or proceeding.

It is therefore quite evident that the gentlemen who prepared the report on this bill had not carefully examined the bill which they were reporting. They have reported that judgments and questions should be conclusive only as between the parties to the original suit, but they have reported a bill so framed as to be conclusive between not only the parties to the original litigation, but conclusive as to the whole world. Now, it is probably unnecessary for me, following the able arguments which have been presented upon this constitutional question, to repeat in any measure what has already been said. I think that nearly everyone here now recognizes that it would be a constitutional impossibility to enact a law which would deprive persons who were not parties to an original suit of their right to their day in court. The chairman of the committee suggested as a reason for this provision that after the United States, with all of its powers and all of its machinery, had litigated the question and failed, that it would be improbable that anyone would be so bold as to institute a suit against the corporation for damages. That was the purport of his question. I suggest that a man might be so bold as to go before a jury of American citizens and ask for justice when the United States had failed before a United States district judge.

It is also suggested by the chairman of the committee that in considering this bill the committee had thought it unfair to so frame it as to be conclusive only as against the corporation defendant in the original suit. It seems to me rather inconsistent to say that it would be unfair to conclude the corporation charged with conspiracy by a decree of a court of equity and then say it would be fair to conclude an individual who brings a suit for damages by a decree of a court, and in a suit to which he was not a party. But apparently the committee have sought to even up this question. They have said that they thought it unfair merely to conclude a party to a suit by a decree in equity, but they believed it would be perfectly fair to conclude the other individual without any day in court at all. I think there is a grave question also as to the constitutionality of the statute, even if changed to conform to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. However, I am not clear upon that question. I am satisfied, however, that the matter never will be settled until it reaches the Supreme Court of the United States. When you enact into this statute a provision which deprives a corporation of the right to a hearing before a jury as provided by the Constitution you will find that statute challenged and you will never know what the law is upon the question until the court of last resort speaks the last word. Personally I am inclined to the opinion that the statute so amended would be constitutional. I am inclined to the opinion that if the corporation is brought into a court of equity upon a proper bill and by a proper service, and with subject matter over which the court has jurisdiction, that probably the findings of fact would be conclusive upon the corporation and would be binding, leaving open only the matter of damages to be submitted to the jury.

However, upon no course of reasoning could it be held that this statute in its present form would be constitutional, and, therefore, I believe that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota should prevail. But if it is thought best to take the chances of the decision of the Supreme Court as it may come in the future upon the statute as it will be when amended that way, that is a matter for this House to decide.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again read.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Did the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] use all the time he desires? If not, will he yield more of his time now to somebody?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, with the general purpose of the committee with reference to this section I am heartily in sympathy. Without this section both the provision of the Sherman law and section 5 of this bill, relating to damages, are absolutely ineffectual so far as affording any real relief or remedy to a litigant is concerned. Take the case of the Standard Oil Co., as already mentioned. It was absolutely impossible for any private individual, no matter how great his injury may have been, to have instituted a case against the Standard Oil Co. and secure a judgment for damages. But, Mr. Chairman, in the effort of the committee to equalize this question of estoppel I am not in sympathy, and I regret exceedingly that the committee has taken the position it has.

I am aware that in the tentative bill that the committee framed that objection was made to the provision relating to estoppel, claiming that it was one-sided and unfair and unjust, and there was some argument made that for that reason it was unconstitutional. At that time, Mr. Chairman, I had made somewhat careful examination and investigation of the authorities with reference to this question, and I became satisfied that the provision as it stood in the tentative bill was constitutional. But, Mr. Chairman, if there was doubt as to the provision in their tentative bill the doubt has been doubled in the bill now before the committee, for originally the estoppel worked only against the defendant, a defendant who had had his day in court, who had had an opportunity to litigate every question that was involved, but now they create an estoppel against a third party, who has never had a day in court, never an opportunity to be heard, and you say that he shall be estopped in the same manner and to the same degree as the defendant, who has had an opportunity to litigate every question that is involved.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what is the right of a defendant in this case or in any kind of a case? It is the right to an opportunity to be heard and a judicial determination upon the facts involved, before his property can be taken from him, and when he has had that opportunity, whether it be in a case between the Government and the defendant or between other parties, the legislative body has a right to say that once that question has been determined it shall be determined for all time, so far as the party is concerned who has had his day in court.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin whether in his judgment the decision, if made applicable only to the defendant who had his day in court, is subject to the criticism that it violates any provision of the Constitution?

Mr. LENROOT. I do not think it is, and I will state my reason.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will be glad to hear you.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, the question of right of trial by jury is subject to limitation. For instance, two private individuals, the plaintiff and defendant, in an equity suit, litigate certain questions, and afterwards a case between the same parties at law arises. They are entitled to a trial by jury at law under the Constitution, but they are not entitled to a trial by jury of every fact or every issue that may be set up in that action of law. If any of those questions have been tried and settled in an action in equity between the same parties, their determination becomes conclusive in an action at law, and an estoppel, as well as in an action at equity. There is the distinction. The defendant here is a party in equity. He and the Government are two parties in equity. Now, when it comes to an action at law between the third party and this defendant who has been one of the parties in the equity suit, it is entirely proper, and not open to any constitutional objection, to say that that judgment that has been rendered between those parties, one of them the defendant, shall be an estoppel against the defendant who was a party to the suit in equity. But it is quite a different thing to say that it shall be an estoppel as against the party who never had a day in court, who was never a party to the equity proceeding.

Now, it has been said by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEALL] that this right of action given the private individual is only a privilege given by the statute, and therefore we may make such conditions as we choose. That is true, Mr. Chairman, so far as treble damages are concerned, but no further. It does not require any statutory provision to give a private individual the right to sue for simple damages any corporation or any individual for violation of the antitrust law. He has that right the same as he has the right against any individual for damages for violation of law. But as this bill now stands it would cut him off and work an estoppel against him in an action that he has regardless of any statute—a right that he has regardless of any statute. And therefore, Mr. Chairman, if this section shall be of any value, it seems to me that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Minnesota should be adopted, and, if adopted, I believe that the section will be sustained and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States. If the section shall stand as it is, I have very grave doubt whether any portion of it will stand, and I am rather inclined to think that the Supreme Court will hold that by reason of this attempted estoppel of third parties who had never had their day in court the entire section will be held invalid.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP].

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to this provision in the bill as it stands, and am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. If this proposition as contained in the bill stands, it would furnish a great advantage to the combinations and trusts of this country, and would enable them to carry on their nefarious business more successfully than heretofore. This provision as it comes from the committee into this House, if adopted, would fortify every combination in restraint of trade, every trust and organization created to suppress competition. Under it they would thrive and flourish as never before. This section if enacted would revolutionize the doctrine of estoppel, as it is a complete innovation in the practice and procedure of now well-established rules. It creates by statute an estoppel which can be invoked against parties who were not connected with litigation, who were strangers to it, who had no knowledge of it, and who had no opportunity to be heard. To my mind it is a most dangerous step, one fraught with evil consequences, and will be productive of much injury in the end. So dangerous do I for one consider it that I can not under any circumstances give it my support. The doctrine of estoppel is a wholesome one, and its employment under existing well-established rules, familiar to all lawyers, serves a valuable purpose in our judicial system. But give it the force and application proposed in this provision and it is made an instrument of danger, to be employed to defeat the ends of justice in meritorious cases. Every illegal combination in restraint of trade, every trust in the country would be gratified with its passage.

Suppose some corporation or individual doing business in New Jersey in violation of this law, in order, under it, to become immune from its provisions, would enter into a collusion with some scoundrel to have a suit brought for the purpose of securing a judgment in its or his favor, in order to plead an estoppel in some other jurisdiction. Application would be made to the district attorney to file the action. He would do so. He would make the charge cover every phase of the law, and then, upon the trial, fail, because of want of a preponderance of the evidence. Testimony would be produced tending to support every material charge necessary to warrant a recovery, but this would be overcome by the defendant either by number of witnesses or intelligence of witnesses or character of witnesses, or for any reason, and judgment on the issues and evidence would be rendered for the defendant. That judgment under this provision would be a complete bar when pleaded in estoppel in any other suit growing out of the same cause of action, it would not matter by whom or where brought. This is a concrete illustration of how injuriously it could be invoked. What a weapon of danger it places in the hands of the law violators, of those who have by their indefensible methods been preying upon the public. Can we adopt such a provision? Others may do as they like—the responsibility is theirs; but, for myself, I should not support it, but do what I can to have it amended so as to escape this pitfall for the engulfment of the people's rights.

I do not care to discuss its constitutionality; others may assail it for that reason. But I do not believe the courts would permit it to stand if it remains as it now is, for the reason it is destructive of the right of the citizen to have his case tried in the courts of the country on its merit and not on the merits of some one else.

Let me take the case that I gave to the gentleman from Texas, involving the same facts. Supposing the Government should bring an action and when it came to trial have only one witness to prove its cause of action, and the defendant came in with three or four witnesses equally as credible and denied the charge. Under the well-settled rules of evidence the defendant would obtain a judgment in the case exonerating it from the charge. This judgment could be pleaded as an estoppel in all subsequent suits involving the same cause of action, it matters not where nor by whom brought. Such a doctrine, in my conception of the administration of justice, is wrong and productive of harm. I can not support such a proposition.

Supposing the same violation of the law should occur in some other State or jurisdiction, and suit was instituted by some other person, and five witnesses were produced to prove the same facts alleged as a violation of the law, and would come into court and establish the facts by an overwhelming preponderance of the evidence, but the defendant would answer that the same facts were litigated in the former trial in some other court between other parties, where the plaintiff had only one witness and the defendant had five or six witnesses, and judgment was rendered for the defendant in that trial. That judgment would be an estoppel against the complainant in the subsequent action. Does any man on this committee think that provision ought to stand? Every man knows, it matters not how strong the evidence would be of the breach of the law, charging the same facts as in the former cause of action, would be forever barred and could not recover.

Furthermore, this provision seems to suppose that these combinations will always do business and use the same methods as they have been using, and yet we all know they are changing their plans of operation every year. But the violations of the same over the same subject matter would constantly be going on and no remedy to prevent it. Does any man in this committee think that kind of a law would be fair to the citizen? He has surely suffered enough. It matters not how strong the evidence would be. Because there was not sufficient evidence in the first case tried or because of collusion, parties are forever estopped from prosecuting suits successfully. The facts are the same. Does any man believe that legislation of that kind would be right? Would it be in aid of the trusts or would it be in the suppression of their unlawful business? Better have no legislation than permit this provision to remain in the measure. It will sorely vex us if we do.

I read that paragraph of the President's message to which the distinguished gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD] alluded. I do not agree with him in his construction of what the President says in that paragraph in reference to this matter.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. If the gentleman had paid particular attention to what I said he would know that I stated expressly that the President only recommended that it should be binding as against the corporation, and that the committee had put in this other provision.

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; I agree with the President in his recommendation in that respect and assert he goes no further on that subject, but I do not agree with the committee in their proposed legislation in this particular matter. I regret the committee insists upon it remaining in the bill. I hope it changes its position in this regard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to have a little more time, if it can be given to me—just two minutes.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, in answer to the statement of the gentleman from Arkansas about litigation in these cases, if we were to leave this open so that every individual could go into court if he desires, the gentleman says it would be too costly upon the litigants. I say to the gentleman that that matter concerns the litigants alone and not the Members of Congress. That is none of their affair. We are not to become the guardians of the individual, to determine how the private individual shall expend his money. That is his business and not ours.

The courthouse doors ought to swing inwardly, and do to every citizen of this country. Yet if we enact this provision as the committee has brought it in here we have closed the doors of the courthouse to the citizens of this country. That is a matter of the highest concern to them. We will have denied to the citizen by the enactment of this provision the right to go into court and recover damages for wrongs inflicted. Why? Forsooth, because a collusive suit has been brought in some place, or had been tried without preparation, or had been tried without sufficient evidence; and yet a stranger, an innocent person, is bound by that decree. He had no say; he took no part in it; and yet by this proposed legislation the door would be shut against him and his cause of action. We are adopting antitrust legislation for relief to a suffering public, furnishing a remedy for wrongs long perpetrated, but I fear if provisions of this kind are incorporated in the measure we will not accomplish our purpose or perform the duty as well as the people desire it should be done. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has six minutes left.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment which I desire to call to the attention of the committee, and I ask to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment is pending.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I offer another amendment at the end of this section, and ask to have it read at this time for the information of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 6, page 23, after the word "laws," on line 18, add "and any evidence or a transcript of any evidence taken at or before the trial of any such suit or proceeding to establish any such determinations shall at any time be admissible in evidence in any action or proceeding brought by any other party than the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] is recognized.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield before he goes into the explanation of this amendment for a question on the other amendment that he has offered?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. This amendment is in line with that.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Suppose that the Associated Press, a news agency, should be attacked by the Government, and the courts should hold that it was not a trust, not a combination in restraint of trade. Under the provisions of this bill as it now stands, would all publishers be estopped from bringing suit against the Associated Press?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; they would be estopped so far as suing for any damages under the antitrust laws.

Mr. MURDOCK. Either simple damages or damages in treble the amount?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is there any question about that?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is not.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman's amendment which he offered previous to the last amendment would remedy a difficulty of that kind?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; that is the object.

Mr. Chairman, I call attention to the amendment that has just been read. During the hearings our attention was called to the fact that something of this kind ought to be written into the law. A suit may be pending and may drag along in the courts. The Government may not prosecute it. During that time, of course, no advantage can be secured from any proceeding on behalf of the Government. Now, it seems to me that if a suit has been brought by an individual and the evidence necessary to establish that suit has been introduced in an action brought on behalf of the Government that evidence might properly be used in the private suit, as well as in the suit in which it was originally taken.

I do not believe any harm would come. It certainly seems to me that if the decree itself can be used as evidence, no real objection can be urged against using the testimony that has been introduced to secure that decree. A defendant charged with being a trust would have the right to introduce testimony in opposition to this evidence, and would otherwise have the right to dispute it. It would be very much fairer than to introduce the decree itself, and it seems to me that if the committee is willing to go as far as they do in this section—that is, to make the decree binding—they ought to be willing to allow that testimony to be used. It would save a great deal of cost and expense to the private litigant if he could take a transcript of the testimony in a suit brought by the Government and use it in his case; take, for instance, depositions or evidence taken before a master in such a suit.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SCOTT. I was going to ask whether the amendment would permit the use of these depositions and the testimony before the submission of the suit in which such testimony was taken?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Yes; I tried to draw the amendment so as to permit that.

Mr. SCOTT. Would not that be open to this objection, that until it was received in evidence no ruling would be made upon its competency?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; but the ruling would be made when it was offered. If it was not competent testimony, it could not be introduced in the suit, but if it was competent, it seems to me it would be perfectly proper to admit it.

Mr. SCOTT. I understood that the amendment went so far as to make it admissible.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It makes it admissible upon the particular issue that is to be determined. That is the object of it. I had a letter a day or two ago from the attorney general of the State of Louisiana, asking for this very thing others asked for before our committee, and it seems to me it would be a proper amendment. It is an amendment to accomplish the purpose sought by this section. If we are honestly striving to help the private litigant, we ought to give him this additional assistance.

Mr. WEBB. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WEBB. I call the attention of the gentleman to his last amendment, which, it seems to me, does the very thing he is striving not to do in his first amendment. The amendment reads as follows:

And any evidence, or a transcript of any evidence, taken at or before the trial of any such suit or proceeding to establish any such determinations—

I think that ought to be "issues"——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The word I used was "determinations."

Mr. WEBB. The amendment continues—shall at any time be admissible in evidence in any action or proceeding brought by any other party than the United States.

That gives both the plaintiff and the defendant the right to use the transcript of evidence.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It is not conclusive; it is only evidence.

Mr. WEBB. But you permit either the plaintiff or the defendant to use it.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It would be evidence in favor of the private party.

Mr. WEBB. It would be evidence in favor of either party who cared to use it.

Mr. SCOTT. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would be objectionable to modify his amendment by saying "competent and material evidence."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. No; but I do not think the court would admit anything not competent and material.

Mr. SCOTT. The amendment as framed makes it admissible, and it strikes me that it would be rather a strong word unless you add the words "competent and material."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It would not be evidence unless it was competent and material. The court would exclude it if it was not competent or material.

Mr. SCOTT. But your amendment uses the word "testimony."

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment and have it pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, after the word "laws," in line 18, insert "That nothing herein contained shall interfere with legitimate business or commercial enterprises, and no citizen shall be deprived of his liberty or happiness while pursuing the same."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. FLOYD].

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. I want to say a few words further in regard to his first amendment. I do not think that the section as drawn is subject to the constitutional objections made to it, or that it denies the right of trial by jury. It relates to evidence, it does not cut off jury trials. I desire to explain again, as I explained in the outset, that the recommendation for this legislation in the President's message was to the effect that the judgment might be used against the corporation adjudged guilty of violations of the Sherman Act in suits by private litigants, and that in the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], from which we took substantially the wording of the provision, the proposition was to make the judgment binding only upon the defendant corporation. I desire to state further that in the tentative bill prepared by the committee and submitted to the House and to the country for consideration we incorporated substantially the language of the provision in the Lenroot bill, providing alone for the introduction of such decree as evidence against the defendant corporation. In the hearings and during the consideration of this section practically all the criticism that was made against it, which provision we regard as one of the most excellent provisions in the bill, was to the effect that to make it apply to only one of the parties litigant was unfair, unjust, and would render the proposition unconstitutional. In view of such criticism we modified it and made it apply equally to both parties.

As I stated, the amendment or modification was made by the Judiciary Committee of the House. Now, speaking for myself and associates on the subcommittee, who had in charge the preparation of the bill, after conference and after this debate, I desire to state that we withdraw our resistance to the first amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, but we still ask the House not to adopt the second amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, may we have the first amendment reported?

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 23, line 5, strike out the words "or has not." In line 7, strike out the words "or has not." In line 14, strike out the words "in favor of or." In line 16, strike out the words "or against."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the second amendment.

The Clerk again reported the second amendment offered by Mr. VOLSTEAD.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw that amendment. While I believe that there ought to be legislation along that line, it is not in just the form that I think it ought to be, and I ask unanimous consent to withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the next amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LEVY].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 33, after the word "laws," in line 18, insert "that nothing herein contained shall interfere with legitimate business or commercial enterprises, and no citizen shall be deprived of his liberty or happiness while pursuing the same."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof.

Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid associations of traffic, operating, accounting, or other officers of common carriers for the purpose of conferring among themselves or of making any lawful agreement as to any matter which is subject to the regulating or supervisory jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, but all such matters shall continue to be subject to such jurisdiction of the commission, and all such agreements shall be entered and kept of record by the carriers, parties thereto, and shall at all times be open to inspection by the commission: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed as modifying existing laws prohibiting the pooling of earnings or traffic, or existing laws against joint agreements by common carriers to maintain rates.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I give notice that on Monday morning at 11 o'clock the committee will offer an amendment to this section, and I reserve the right now to offer it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment. I shall not be here on Monday, and I would like to have my amendment pending.

Mr. WEBB. I have no objection to the gentleman from Illinois offering an amendment.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the second paragraph of section 7.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in this connection, if I may be permitted for just a moment to do so, that I believe this second paragraph of section 7 exempts the railroads of the United States from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, that it is more drastic in its provisions in that respect than was section 7 in a bill to regulate the railroads passed by the House in 1910. This not only gives traffic associations connected with railroads the opportunity for organizing, but it gives also the operating, accounting, and other officers of common carriers the same privilege. It grants to the officers of one railroad, the traffic officers, the executive officers, and all other officers connected with the railroad, the privilege of entering into a combination with similar officers of any other railroad, permits them to enter into any traffic arrangements they choose, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the right to supervise the matters which are the subjects of traffic agreements, but does not give the Interstate Commerce Commission any right whatever over the agreements themselves. All the Interstate Commerce Commission would have the right to do under this provision would be to accept the contracts entered into by the combination permitted to the railroad companies under this second paragraph of section 7, for filing purposes.

I protest against the passage of this paragraph, and I wish to give notice to the country that the committee in recommending it for adoption have simply recommended the relief of the railroad companies of the country from prosecution under the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, whereas all the way through the bill they seek to restrict all other branches of business from entering into trade agreements of any kind and provide for the imposition of fines and imprisonment for those who enter into such agreements. It seems strange that in the same bill the committee should recommend the exemption of railroads from the provisions of the Sherman law while imposing greater restrictions on all other business organizations. I see no justification for such action. All should be treated alike; all should be exempt or none should be. This bill creates monopolies on the one hand and destroys legitimate business on the other, gives to those who have and takes away from those who have not.

The wish of the Democratic leaders seems to be to satisfy the railroads, and in the next to fool the labor leaders. No one should close his eyes to the deal with the railroads evidenced in section 7. The railroads would be worse hurt by a real exemption than any other interest, and the second paragraph of section 7 was smuggled in at the last minute. But not one word of objection comes from that source, nor will there be any organized opposition to the compromise amendments, so called. Before taking them up, I call attention to an excerpt from the New York Sun, which is ever on the alert for any menace to capital:

President Wilson, on the other hand, takes the stand that the amendment he has approved will not preclude the prosecution of labor unions for acts in violation of the antitrust laws. His supporters in the House, who had aided in drafting the amendment, have advised him that the language to be added to the Clayton bill will merely clarify that section which deals with labor organizations, and that it will not, in fact, exempt them from prosecution.

It is proposed to add at the end of the first paragraph this sentence:

Nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

The addition is superfluous and merely senseless repetition in its purport of what precedes.

If the antitrust laws are not to be construed "to forbid," and so forth, or "to forbid or restrain individual members," and so forth, what need to say that they shall not "be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws"? Laws such as the antitrust act do not apply to any individuals or classes, whether acting together or singly as such, nor has any court ever said that they do. The law applies not to any persons, natural or artificial, as persons or as organizations, but solely to their acts or conduct. If members of an organization should in fact restrain trade, according to the judgment of a court, section 7 neither as it stands nor as it is proposed to amend it would protect them. They would not restrain trade in their organized capacity. They would not if they tried, because not within the legal purposes of the organization. The courts would simply ignore their relation to the labor organization, as they did in the case of Loewe against Lawler. Section 7 is simply abortive. The purpose that labor would accomplish by it should not be attempted in the exercise of congressional power under the interstate-commerce clause, but under the power to create courts and regulate their jurisdiction.

Section 7 therefore, whether considered as it stands or as it is proposed to "amend" it, is merely innocuous and abortive.

But sections 15 and 18 are not mere "gold bricks." They are gold bricks containing dynamite. Democratic Party pledges have been profuse and explicit, but the alleged performance is not merely a mockery. It is a betrayal and death thrust. Those who pretend to represent labor and yet cast their fortunes in with the Democrats on sections 15 and 18, believing that exposure will not be swift and complete, have another guess coming.

Now, what is the revamped "amendment" to section 18? At the end of the second paragraph of section 18 it is proposed to add the words, "Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful." I would like you to take the matter up for yourself and answer for yourself this question. Does that meet any criticism that has been offered to the section?

The amendment directs the courts to take the view as to certain acts which, upon reading the paragraph, they must take anyhow.

None of the acts specified ever were held unlawful per se; and after the care taken to annex to them the qualifying words "peacefully" and "lawfully," or "peaceful" and "lawful," how would it be possible for a court to now hold them unlawful per se? And that is all that the new amendment purports to require of them.

The vice of section 18 is the fact that it gives with one hand and takes away with the other, as is shown in some of the speeches on the floor, and that sections 15 and 18, in combination, confer a new jurisdiction, or, at any rate, confirm a jurisdiction, which, it was claimed, was usurped and heretofore exercised destructively.

No one has attempted to answer this criticism, and no one can answer it; so I need not dwell upon it. I will, however, add just a few words. Some one may say that the section will be given a liberal construction. On the contrary, having the form of an exemption from ordinary course of procedure, it must be construed strictly. And when anyone argues that the words "employer and employees" will be held to mean those previously holding the relation, the courts will refuse to so radically change and extend the meaning.

In conclusion I call attention to this from the New York World:

A decision not to wait for the House to act on the trust legislation was reached to-day by the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, which has been considering an omnibus trust bill. This measure, it was decided, should be reported out as soon as possible, regardless of what the House might do in the meanwhile.

Let the significance of that be noted. The President has evidently studied Capt. Cuttle, and is "devilish sly." After labor has been betrayed by its friends in the House, their work will be nullified in the Senate. But they will have taken the gag from the Democrats and won popular support for Democracy's candidates, unless their exposure be complete and prompt. The World is the administration's mouthpiece.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, it is understood that if the committee rise at this time other amendments may be in order on next Monday morning when the House reconvenes at 11 o'clock?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. HAY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. SENATE.

MONDAY, June 1, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

Rev. C. Everest Granger, D. D., of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O glorious Lord God, maker, preserver, and giver of all good, we approach Thee this day with all reverence, with deep humility, and in simple faith. Grant us, we pray Thee, the great blessing of Thy divine grace. May Thy wisdom instruct, Thy spirit inspire, and Thy love overshadow all Thy servants this day. Make us deeply sensible of our need of Thee, and give us, we pray Thee, a comfortable assurance of Thy presence at all times and of Thy aid in special hours of need. Help us in our helplessness to lean hard upon Thee, and when we lean hard upon Thee help us. Vouchsafe to us, O God, strength for the duties of life and Thy wisdom, that we may intelligently do Thy will and serve our fellow men. In mercy pardon our sins and eternally save us. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

TRANSPORTATION BETWEEN ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC PORTS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Interstate Commerce Commission, acknowledging receipt of resolution of the Senate of the 16th ultimo, relative to the ownership of and rates charged by vessels between Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

POST-OFFICE EMPLOYEES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., June 1, 1914.

The PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am in receipt of Senate resolution 373, reading as follows:

"Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to transmit to the Senate the following information:

"First. The names, ages, and length of service of those employees in the department in the District of Columbia and in the post office in Washington City who served in any war of the United States and who have been demoted, discharged, or resignations called for since March 4, 1914.

"Second. The rating of efficiency of each of such employees on March 4, 1914, and the rating with which they were credited at the date of demotion, discharge, or when resignation was called for."

In compliance with this resolution I wish to state that none of the employees of this department who served in any war of the United States has resigned or been removed since March 4, 1914. The only such person demoted is George Marshall, who, on March 24, 1914, was reduced from fireman, at $720, to laborer, at $660, on account of the excessive use of intoxicants. Mr. Marshall is 48 years old, has served in the department five years, and is a veteran of the Spanish-American War. He was informed at the time of his reduction that if his record warranted such action he would be restored to his former grade at the expiration of two months, and he was so restored on May 24, 1914.

The names, ages, length of service, and efficiency ratings of the war veterans in the employ of the Washington, D. C., post office who have been demoted, dropped from the rolls, or resigned from the service since March 4, 1914, are as follows:

Name.	Age.	Length of service.	Efficiency rating.	Action taken.
		Years.
William E. Tew	74	37	78.4	Resigned.
Samuel R. Strattan	74	[1] 7	85	Do.
William A. Hutchins	77	19	84.8	Do.
Joseph Randall	77	47	94.6	Do.
John J. B. Lerch	81	51	59.2	Do.
Augustus Ridgely	78	51	69.1	Do.
G. T. Galliher [2]	68	32	85	Reduced.
O. T. Putnam	71	11	75	Do.
William W. Mills	77	42	88	Dropped.
George Dean	69	41	88	Do.

[1] Months. [2] Confederate Civil War veteran.

The postmaster states that these ratings covered the period from July 1 to December 31, 1913, and were the ratings of these persons on March 4, 1914, and at the time of their demotion, resignation, or separation from the service. There have been no removals or resignations during the present administration of any other persons employed in the Washington post office who served in any war of the United States, and the only such person demoted during that time was Henry L. Johnson, who was reduced in rank and salary on June 7, 1913, on charges preferred by Mr. Fulton R. Gordon, of Washington, D. C., who stated that in doing so he was "simply performing a patriotic duty."

There is inclosed a copy of a letter dated May 28, 1914, from the postmaster of Washington explaining why the action recommended by him was necessary.

Very truly, yours,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

WASHINGTON CITY POST OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER.
May 28, 1914.

Honorable POSTMASTER GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: In response to a letter from the chief clerk of the department, dated May 27, asking for certain information called for in a resolution adopted by the United States Senate May 26, I transmit herewith the names, ages, length of service, and efficiency ratings of the war veterans in the employ of the Washington post office who have been demoted or dropped from the rolls or have resigned from the service since March 4, 1914. The ratings here given were made on January 1, 1914, and covered the period from July 1, 1913, to December 31, 1913. They were the only ratings with which the men were credited either on March 4, 1914, or at the time of their demotion or separation from the service. The information, as far as I am able to ascertain from the records of the office or from the employees in the office, is as follows:

William E. Tew; salary, $900; age, 74 years; period of service, 37 years; rating, 78.4 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; resigned.

Samuel R. Strattan; salary, $1,200; age, 74 years; period of service, 7 months; rating, 85 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; resigned.

William A. Hutchins; salary, $1,200; age, 77 years; period of service, 19 years; rating, 84.8 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; resigned.

Joseph Randall; salary, $1,200; age, 77 years; period of service, 47 years; rating, 94.6 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; resigned.

John J. B. Lerch; salary, $900; age, 81 years; period of service, 51 years; rating, 59.2 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; resigned.

G. T. Galliher, salary, $1,000; age, 68 years; period of service, 32 years; rating, 85 per cent; Confederate Civil War veteran; reduced to $800.

O. T. Putnam, salary, $1,000; age, 71 years; period of service, 11 years; rating, 75 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; reduced to $800.

Augustus Ridgely, salary, $1,100; age, 78 years; period of service, 51 years; rating 69.1 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; resigned.

William W. Mills, salary, $1,200; age, 77 years; period of service, 42 years; rating, 88 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; dropped.

George Dean, salary, $1,200; age, 69 years; period of service, 41 years; rating, 88 per cent; Union Civil War veteran; dropped.

These separations and demotions were only a small part of the results of the reorganization intended to put the administration of the Washington post office on a business basis. Less than 20 per cent of the employees affected by the reorganization were veterans of wars, which is a small percentage when it is considered that a large number of the older employees in the office are war veterans.

In order that you may be fully informed as to what has been undertaken in the Washington post office, I beg to report to you the results to date of this reorganization which was undertaken to enable the post office to render greater efficiency to the public, to keep the expenditures of the office within the allotment of money available for this city, and to comply with the spirit and intent of the law.

Growing out from this reorganization there have been to date 18 resignations and 30 demotions, while 3 employees have been dropped from the rolls. With three exceptions those who have either resigned or been dropped from the rolls were no longer necessary to the service, and the department has been advised that no appointments will have to be made to fill the vacancies thus caused.

Separations from the service as a result of this reorganization had nothing to do with the nationality, religion, or politics of any employee concerned, but were based only on consideration of the employee's efficiency or his necessity to the service, as is required by the following provision of the act of Congress approved April 1, 1909:

"The establishment of a civil-pension roll or an honorable-service roll, or the exemption of any of the officers, clerks, and persons in the Postal Service from the existing laws respecting employment in such service is hereby prohibited."

I do not know, save from hearsay, the number of former soldiers involved in these separations, but I have been informed that of the 51 employees separated or demoted 9 were Union and 1 were Confederate war veterans. Of the 21 persons separated from the service 1 (a Union war veteran) was totally deaf, and every direction given him had to be in writing; 1, a woman, had never recovered from a stroke of apoplexy, but had been kept on the rolls nearly a year, although unable to do more than the simplest desk work that required the services of another employee in constant supervision; 2 others, also Union war veterans, had afflictions of the mouth, commonly believed and feared by other employees to be malignant cancers and to be a menace to their associates and to the recipients of mail; while several others were in such stages of physical or mental incapacity as to either render their services nil, or require constant supervision. One of the war veterans whose affliction of the mouth is feared to be malignant cancer handled incoming letter mail for the Washington public, while the other, with an apparently like affliction, handled mail for Members of the House of Representatives and United States Senators.

When I assumed charge of the Washington post office on April 1, 1914, I entered upon the work with a mind free from any prejudice as to the personnel of the office or its administrative methods. However, in the councils with my supervisory officials, I speedily became aware of an intolerable situation in the office. I found that the service was top-heavy in the matter of the lighter desk and window work, and that the public interest demanded a strengthening of the distribution service, on which rests the whole intricate and responsible scheme of dispatch and delivery of the mails.

The civil-service system had been in force long enough to fill the office with elderly employees, particularly men too old to memorize the complex and ever-changing schemes of routing and distributing the mail. In addition, there had been unloaded on the Washington post office in a long course of years, through strong political influence or as a convenience to various departments of the Government, a large number of inexperienced employees whose services had not been sought by the post office, and who were not needed in its operation. Notwithstanding the inhibition of the United States statutes against keeping on the Government pay rolls useless, inefficient, or incapacitated employees, a desperate effort had been made to take care of these employees in some manner, with the result that all kinds of needless clerical or window jobs were created for them, either in the main office or outlying stations. Some of these persons were given the baldest pretenses at earning their salaries, ranging from $720 to $1,800 a year—mostly at $1,200 a year.

Although there was employed a sufficient force of unskilled laborers, one aged man was assigned to picking up scraps of paper on the postoffice sidewalk. For eight hours a day of this character of service he was drawing a salary of $720 a year. He was given a rating of 88.5 per cent. Two men were "pensioned" at $900 a year each, watching the messengers in a closed-in room awaiting their turns to take out special-delivery letters. A number of men were employed at the "cutting table" at a salary of $100 per month each. Their duty was to cut open small packages of letters. Others were given employment at the "facing table," at a salary of $100 per month. All they had to do was to arrange the letters on a table with the address sides facing in one direction and separating the long from the short envelopes. Any boy or girl could do the work at either the "facing table" or "cutting table," yet for eight hours a day of this character of work these men were receiving each a salary—substantially a pension—of $1,200 a year. This is the salary paid expert distributors for the most trying work in the postal service, and to earn which these distributors must constantly practice and study their work at home after completing their day's task in the post office. On these tasks at the "cutting" and "facing" tables at $1,200 a year were employed four of the men separated from the service. All four men were Union war veterans. The services of all these men were unnecessary, as the work is easily absorbed by the regular office force in the slack time. In addition, other places were created, equally unnecessary, equally simple, and equally well paid. Every device within the broadest interpretation of the law was resorted to in an effort to keep aged or politically protected employees on the pay roll.

In the meantime there was a constant strain on the distribution service, which needed keeping up to the highest pitch of efficiency, because of the steady growth of the mails and the great strides made by the parcel post. There were 1,097 employees on the pay roll of the Washington post office. Its quota was full. Under the Post Office appropriation act the Post Office Department could not allot to the Washington office the additional men so sorely needed in the handling of the mails. Every unexpected important rush of mail necessitated the employment of extra men or overtime, until this overtime and extra service has reached the sum of $20,000 a year for the Washington office. Yet here were men in the important operating divisions of the office doing practically children's work for salaries of $1,200 a year, who by their retention in the service were preventing the employment of young and active men for the swift and complex work involved in the movement of mail matter.

On the one hand was the public entitled to an exacting and expeditious handling of their mail and on the other was the department requiring that the Washington office keep expenditures within the sum available for its operation. At the same time the supervising heads, who were in no way responsible for this state of affairs in the office, were clamoring for relief from a condition that not only was intolerable, but constantly was growing worse.

With the consent of the department I undertook to give that relief, and am giving it, by the introduction of such simple business methods as it is obvious that this particular situation required. The plan of reorganizing the operating force of the office on a rational basis as is now being carried out consists of eliminating all employees whose services are not necessary or whose work can be more expeditiously and intelligently performed by efficient men. Under the head of unnecessary employees come those whose work can be absorbed with ease by the large force always available in the slack time in the office. This includes those who have resigned or have been dropped because their infirmity or incapacity has permitted them to do but a limited range of the exacting work involved in handling the mails; also men and women assigned to window or desk work, not because they were needed but because places had to be found for them to keep them on the Government pay roll.

It appears to have been a long-standing policy in the Government service generally to be more liberal with the creation of positions than ordinary business experience would justify. For instance, in one station in the 13 hours that the windows are open there were sold last year a daily average of $103 worth of stamps. For presiding at that window 8 hours a day one employee received $1,200 a year. At another window an average of 18 money orders were cashed or issued in the 13-hour period, and for presiding at that window 8 hours a day, cashing or issuing an average of less than 2 money orders an hour, and doing a negligible amount of clerical work on the side, an employee received $1,200 a year. At a third window an average of 12 pieces of registered mail were handled during the 13-hour period, and for 8 hours of this kind of service, together with a small amount of clerical work on the side, a clerk received $1,200 a year. Ordinary business instinct, if not a proper conception of public duty, would suggest consolidating those jobs in the hands of one efficient clerk. That is what I have ordered done. The Washington office being already oversupplied with such help, I was compelled to advise the Post Office Department that the services of two of these clerks are no longer necessary.

In this manner the main office and the stations are being reorganized. Superfluous employees are being eliminated and the slack is being taken up wherever possible by concentrating the work of the service for greater efficiency and closer supervision.

There has also been undertaken a readjustment of salaries commensurate with the character of work performed, and this has resulted in the recommendation of a number of decreases as well as increases of salary.

The system of ratings has been improved, the rating now being broken up into the several elements that enter into an employee's standing. As a result an employee's rating hereafter will reflect his value to the Postal Service as well as his regularity of attendance and proficiency in the particular task on which he is engaged.

By this course of administration we are beginning to live with greater efficiency within the allotments that the Post Office appropriation act makes possible for this office. At the same time we have been able to steadily improve the post-office service to the people. Since April 1 we have added carriers and wagons for the delivery service; we have extended the territory for the five-trip business delivery; we have vastly improved the mail collections and are building up and strengthening the distribution service of the office.

In the conduct of this reorganization, much of which was of a painful nature, I have had the loyal and unselfish support of the supervisory heads of the office.

I will add that in the light of the provision of the law which reads: "The establishment of a civil pension roll or an honorable service roll, or the exemption of any of the officers, clerks, and persons in the Postal Service from the existing laws respecting employment in such service, is hereby prohibited," I could not possibly take into consideration the personal fortunes of those who, unfortunately, had to be separated from the service. To have done so would have made it impossible to carry out this reorganization, which has been undertaken solely for the double purpose of rendering greater efficiency to the public and of bringing the service within the letter and intent of the law.

Very respectfully,

OTTO PRAEGER, Postmaster.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication will be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the report ought to be disposed of in some way. I should prefer to have it lie on the table or to have it taken up to-morrow morning. It is in response to a resolution which has fulfilled its object. It calls for certain information from the Postmaster General, which information is supplied by this communication. If it is merely to go in the RECORD and lie there without anything else being done, it seems to me it will be a useless performance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will inquire what can be done with it.

Mr. STONE. I think, on proper consideration, to-morrow morning or some later morning we can have it, at least, referred to a committee or printed as a Senate document.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the communication is in response to a resolution which the Senate has adopted.

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. It gives us the information called for. Of course I should be very glad to see it published as a document, although I think having it printed in the RECORD probably will give us all the information that is necessary. The communication gives us the information called for. There is no other resolution pending.

Mr. STONE. At all events, I desire to make some observations on it. I shall not do so this morning, for the reason that I do not care to interfere with my friend the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], who had risen to proceed with his address; but to-morrow morning, if I can get a few moments' time, I wish to make some observations on the report.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will allow me, I think, by unanimous consent, we can have it lie on the table for a day, and then I think it ought to be referred to some committee.

Mr. STONE. That was my idea—to have it printed and lie on the table.

Mr. OVERMAN. Does it not go into the RECORD, anyway, by reading?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course.

Mr. STONE. Yes; it goes in the RECORD.

Mr. OVERMAN. I submit, then, that it ought to lie on the table.

Mr. STONE. It has been read, so it will appear in the RECORD; but we do not wish to throw it away on the floor. We ought to do something with it. I ask, therefore, that it lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. STONE. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. I hope the communication may be printed. It was not read in its entirety, so it would not all go into the RECORD. I hope it may be printed in the RECORD and also as a document.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. NELSON. I make the request, with the permission of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. But I should like to dispose of it in that way to-morrow morning instead of this morning. I ask that it lie on the table for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The communication has been ordered printed in the RECORD. It will lie on the table until some further disposition has been made of it.

Mr. JONES. I understand it is intended that the letter from the postmaster of the city of Washington accompanying the communication is also to be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The whole document.

Mr. JONES. So that it will all be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

RENO COMMERCIAL CLUB.

TERMS OF COURT AT ERIE, PA.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 15190) to amend section 103 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 3, 1911, as amended by the act of Congress approved March 3, 1913, and I submit a report (No. 574) thereon.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. I will state that it is simply a bill changing the time for holding the terms of court in the city of Erie, in the western district of Pennsylvania. It has passed the House, and its enactment is requested by the judges of our district courts and by the members of the bar generally in western Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask that the report of the House committee, which is a very short one, may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that may be done.

The report is as follows:

[House Report No. 536, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

TERMS OF COURT AT ERIE, PA.

Mr. GRAHAM of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 15190:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15190), report the same back with the recommendation that it do pass.

The changes made in existing law by this bill are as follows:

1. Changes the day for the beginning of the terms of the district court of the western district of Pennsylvania by providing that the sessions of said court held at Erie shall begin on the third Mondays in March and September of each year instead of as now provided on the third Mondays of January and July. This change is desired by the court and bar in that locality for their greater convenience and the facility of business. The time of the meeting of the court at Pittsburgh remains unchanged, the court meeting part of the time at Erie and part of the time at Pittsburgh.

2. Provides that—

"The clerk shall place all cases in which the defendants reside in the counties of said (western) district nearest Erie upon the trial list for trial at Erie, where the same shall be tried, unless the parties thereto stipulate that the same may be tried at Pittsburgh."

This matter is now governed by the discretion of the clerk, and this change substitutes therefor a fixed rule except in those cases governed by a stipulation of the parties.

The effect of this bill is purely local, and meets with the approval of those whom its adoption will affect. It is believed that the changes are wholesome ones and will promote the administration of justice.

TERMS OF COURT IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. CHILTON. From the Committee on the Judiciary I report back favorably without amendment the bill (S. 5574) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States, and I submit a report (No. 575) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill. I will explain that it refers entirely to the holding of court in the State of West Virginia and provides two additional places at which court shall be held, one in the northern district and one in the southern district. It meets with the approbation of both Senators from that State.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

A bill (S. 5574) to amend and reenact section 113 of chapter 5 of the Judicial Code of the United States.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, during the present session of Congress a joint resolution was passed providing for the appointment by the President of a commission to consider the question of national aid to vocational education, and to report upon the advisability of such aid, and, if possible, to present also a plan for the aid. The joint resolution required the commission to report by June 1.

The President named the commission, consisting of Senator Page and myself, Congressmen Hughes and Fess, Mr. John A. Lapp, Mr. C. A. Prosser, Mr. Charles H. Winslow, Miss Agnes Nestor, and Miss Florence M. Marshall.

For the last two months the commission has been laboriously at work. The two Senators and the two Congressmen have given to the commission all the time possible, while the five other members have devoted all of their days to the work and have also frequently worked at night. Senator PAGE and myself, together with the two Congressmen, were necessarily compelled to leave the substance of the report largely to the five noncongressional members, who gave all of their time to the work, and while the nine members of the commission signed the report, it is chiefly the product of the five noncongressional members of the commission.

A large amount of testimony was taken upon the subject. Letters of inquiry were written to every State asking for the views of State superintendents and other educators. The commission has directed that the testimony be printed.

The report which I present to-day will also be printed under the supervision of the commission.

After paying for printing the reports we are gratified to state that there will still be about $4,000 left unexpended from the $15,000 appropriated for the use of this commission.

We have jointly perfected a bill which provides for eventually an appropriation of $7,000,000 by the National Government toward training teachers and toward paying the salaries of teachers for vocational educational work.

By direction of the commission 5,000 copies of the report are being printed for the use of the Senate.

I present not only the report, but I offer the bill which is approved by all the members of the commission, and I ask that it be read by title and printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The bill (S. 5706) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure, was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 5706) to provide for the promotion of vocational education; to provide for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such education in agriculture and the trades and industries; to provide for cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of vocational subjects; and to appropriate money and regulate its expenditure.

That in order to receive the benefits of such appropriation for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects the State board of any State shall provide in its plan for agricultural education that such education shall be that which is supported and controlled by the public; that the controlling purpose of such education shall be to fit for useful employment; that such education shall be of less than college grade and be designed to meet the needs of persons over 14 years of age who have entered upon or who are preparing to enter upon the work of the farm or of the farm home; that the State or local community, or both, shall provide the necessary plant and equipment determined upon by the State board with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education as the minimum requirement for such education in schools and classes in the State; that the amount expended for the maintenance of such education in any school or class receiving the benefit of such appropriation shall be not less annually than the amount fixed by the State board, with the approval of the Federal board, as the minimum for such schools or classes in the State; that such schools shall provide for directed or supervised practice in agriculture either on a farm provided for by the school or other farm for at least six months per year; that the teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects shall have at least the minimum qualifications determined for the State by the State board with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education.

SEC. 11. That in order to receive the benefits of the appropriation for the salaries of teachers of trade and industrial subjects the State board of any State shall provide in its plan for trade and industrial education that such education shall be given in schools or classes supported and controlled by the public; that the controlling purpose of such education shall be to fit for useful employment; that such education shall be of less than college grade and shall be designed to meet the needs of persons over 14 years of age who are preparing for a trade or industrial pursuit or who have entered upon the work of a trade or industrial pursuit; that the State or local community, or both, shall provide the necessary plant and equipment determined upon by the State board with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education as the minimum requirement in such State for education for any given trade or industrial pursuit; that the total amount expended for the maintenance of such education in any school or class receiving the benefit of such appropriation shall be not less annually than the amount fixed by the State board, with the approval of the Federal board, as the minimum for such schools or classes in the State; that such schools or classes giving instruction to persons who have not entered upon employment shall require that at least half of the time of such instruction be given to practical work on a useful or productive basis, such instruction to extend over not less than 9 months per year and not less than 30 hours per week; that at least one-third of the sum appropriated to any State for the salaries of teachers of trade and industrial subjects shall, if expended, be applied to part-time schools or classes for young workers over 14 years of age who have entered upon employment, and such subjects in a part-time school or class may mean any subject given to enlarge the civic or vocational intelligence of such workers over 14 and less than 18 years of age; that such part-time schools or classes shall provide for not less than 144 hours of classroom instruction per year; that evening industrial schools shall fix the age of 16 years as a minimum entrance requirement and shall confine instruction to that which is supplemental to the daily employment; that the teachers of any trade or industrial subject in any State shall have at least the minimum qualifications for teachers of such subject determined upon for such State by the State board with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education: Provided, That for cities and towns of less than 25,000 population, according to the last preceding United States census, the State board, with the approval of the Federal board for vocational education, may modify the conditions as to the length of course and hours of instruction per week for schools and classes giving instruction to those who have not entered upon employment in order to meet the particular needs of such cities and towns.

SEC. 12. That in order to receive the benefits of the appropriation in this act for the training of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects, or of teachers of trade and industrial or home economics subjects, the State board of any State shall provide in its plan for such training that the same shall be carried out under the supervision of the State board; that such training shall be given in schools or classes supported and controlled by the public; that such training shall be given only to persons who have had adequate vocational experience or contact in the line of work for which they are preparing themselves as teachers, supervisors, or directors, or who are acquiring such experience or contact as a part of their training, and that the State board, with the approval of the Federal board, shall establish minimum requirements for such experience or contact for teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects, and for teachers of trade and industrial and home economics subjects; that not more than 60 per cent nor less than 20 per cent of the money appropriated under this act for the training of teachers of vocational subjects to any State for any year shall be expended in the preparation of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects or of teachers of trade and industrial subjects or of teachers of home economics subjects.

SEC. 13. That in order to secure the benefits of the appropriations for the salaries of teachers, supervisors, or directors of agricultural subjects, or for the salaries of teachers of trade and industrial subjects or for the training of teachers as herein provided, any State shall, through the legislative authority thereof, appoint the State treasurer as custodian for vocational education, who shall receive and provide for the proper custody and disbursement of moneys paid to the State from said appropriations.

SEC. 14. That the Federal board for vocational education shall annually ascertain whether the States are using or are prepared to use the moneys received by them in accordance with the provisions of this act On or before the 1st day of January of each year the Federal board for vocational education shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury as to each State which has accepted the provisions of this act and complied therewith, certifying the amounts which each State is entitled to receive under the provisions of this act. Upon such certification the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay quarterly to the custodian for vocational education of each State the moneys to which it is entitled under the provisions of this act. The moneys so received by the custodian for vocational education for any State shall be paid out on the requisition of the State board, as reimbursement for expenditures already incurred, to such schools as are approved by said State board and are entitled to receive such moneys under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 15. That whenever any portion of the fund annually allotted to any State has not been expended for the purpose provided for in this act, a sum equal to such portion shall be deducted by the Federal board from the next succeeding annual allotment from such fund to such State.

SEC. 16. That the Federal board for vocational education may withhold the allotment of moneys to any State whenever it shall appear that such moneys are not being expended for the purposes and under the conditions of this act. If any allotment is withheld from any State, the State board of such State may appeal to the Congress of the United States, and if the Congress shall not direct such sum to be paid, it shall be covered into the Treasury.

SEC. 17. That if any portion of the moneys received by the custodian for vocational education of any State under this act, for any given purpose named in this act, shall by any action or contingency be diminished or lost, it shall be replaced by such State, and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation for such education shall be paid to such State. No portion of any moneys appropriated under this act for the benefit of the States shall be applied, directly or indirectly, to the purchase, erection, preservation, or repair of any building or buildings or equipment, or for the purchase or rental of lands.

SEC. 18. That the Federal board for vocational education shall make an annual report to Congress, on or before December 1, on the administration of this act and shall include in such report the reports made by the State boards on the administration of this act by each State and the expenditure of the money allotted to each State.

THE INCOME TAX.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 155) to remit under certain conditions and for the year 1914 the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act, in cases where said returns are completed by June 1, 1914, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

To remit under certain conditions and for the year 1914 the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act, in cases where said returns are completed by June 1, 1914.

Whereas the income tax has gone into effect for the first time during the present year; and

Whereas through misapprehension of the law many parties have failed to make their proper returns prior to March 1, 1914: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the penalties provided by the act approved October 3, 1913, for failure to properly return the income tax provided for in said act, be, and the same are hereby, remitted for the present year in all cases where said returns are completed by June 1 of the present year, and where the failure to make said returns was not due to a purpose willfully to refrain from making the same.

STATISTICS ON MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I introduce a joint resolution, which I ask may be read at length.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 154) authorizing and directing the Director of the Census to collect and publish statistics of marriage and divorce was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Director of the Census be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to collect and publish the statistics of and relating to marriage and divorce in the several States and the District of Columbia for the seven years from January 1, 1907, to December 31, 1913, and for each year thereafter annually: Provided, That such statistics as now required by law to be collected be used so far as it is practicable to do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. There is a petition accompanying the joint resolution which I should like to have read in connection with it. It will explain the measure.

There being no objection, the petition was read, as follows:

INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE ON MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE,
May 11, 1914.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned petitioners, all being citizens of the United States, respectfully pray that provisions be made for the collection of statistics of and relating to marriage and divorce for the seven years from 1907 to 1913, inclusive, and annually hereafter.

Your memorialists respectfully point out the reasons given in the petitions for the prior investigations, and beg leave to refer you to Bulletin 96 of the Bureau of the Census and to the two-volume Report on Marriage and Divorce issued by it in 1908 and 1909, presenting a summary of the earlier investigation and the full data for the 20 years from 1887 to 1906.

From these volumes and from the estimates made in the official correspondence of this bureau it appears that over 1,000,000 divorces will be granted in the United States in 10 years ending with 1916.

We also show that in spite of the many changes in the marriage and divorce laws of the several States in the past 65 years the tide of divorces has steadily risen throughout every portion of our Nation at an average rate three times as great as the rate of increase of the population.

And we would show further that the increase of interest evidenced by memorials and resolutions from many most important educational bodies, both religious and secular, requires that exact information be had every year from the Government concerning the more than 100,000 divorces that are now being granted annually in our own continental United States.

Alfred Harding, Bishop of Washington; David H. Greer, Bishop of New York; William T. Manning, Trinty Church, New York; Natalie F. Hammond; Morgan J. O'Brien; Newell De Witt Hillis, Plymouth Church, Brooklyn; W. Bourke Cockran; Cornelius Woelfkin, Fifth Avenue Baptist Church, New York City; Samuel McCune Lindsay; Christian F. Reisner, Pastor Grace Methodist Church, New York City; Felix Adler, Leader of the Society for Social Culture; Wm. Jay Schieffelin.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I notice that the joint resolution calls upon the Director of the Census. I will ask the Senator if we have a Director of the Census at the present time?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is my opinion that we have a very fine one, Mr. President.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought I read the other day that he was a candidate for the governorship of a great State, and I did not suppose that he would continue to hold his office while seeking the governorship of a State.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I think the matter will be handled satisfactorily to all concerned.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is to say, if he fails to elect himself governor of the State he will continue Director of the Census, I suppose. Is that the idea?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator has had long experience in politics, and he must know that very few people voluntarily resign.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am glad that we have a Director of the Census. I was afraid we had none.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution and accompanying petition will be referred to the Committee on the Census.

AMENDMENT TO THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. LIPPITT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS.

Mr. CUMMINS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 384), which was read:

Resolved, That immediately after the final disposition of the bill now the unfinished business the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 4522, to amend the interstate-commerce act relative to liability of common carriers.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I will explain the resolution by saying that it is the bill to which I referred some days ago and for which I asked unanimous consent for consideration at that time I do not believe it will require more than 20 minutes to dispose of the bill. It is a very important one. It is intended to relieve shippers of freight upon railways from the very unjust and burdensome rule which has been placed upon them since the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Adams Express Co. against Groniger, and to remedy an obvious and acknowledged defect in what is known as the Carmack amendment, adopted in 1906.

I do not want to interfere in any way with procedure that will hasten the final disposition of the tolls bill, but I hope that I may have this bill considered immediately after it. I assure the Senate that there is nothing in the bill that will provoke any considerable debate; at least I believe there is nothing of the kind in it, because it is reported unanimously by the Interstate Commerce Committee, and I think if there had been any grave objection to it it would have been encountered in that committee.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I have had on the calendar a notice for two months that I would call up Senate joint resolution No. 10. While I do not want to interfere with the short discussion of any other measure, it seems to me that the Senator from Iowa could easily call up his bill after 1 o'clock and have consideration of it for a full hour. I would have no objection whatever to that course, but to substitute it for another measure and make it the order of business seems to me would not be the proper course in view of the notices which have been given.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am glad to have that suggestion from the Senator from Colorado, and I comply with it by asking unanimous consent to take up the bill for consideration now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I feel obliged to say to the Senator from Iowa that I have been very assiduously endeavoring to obtain for the bill S. 4405, popularly known as the radium bill, the parliamentary situation of unfinished business. I reiterate that these valuable lands belonging to the Government of the United States are being absorbed every day by what practically amounts to a monopoly of the production of radium in this country which is unloading its product upon the people at a cost from two to three times its real value, and that the Government hospitals, in order to keep pace with the private hospitals in the country and hospitals abroad managed and conducted by Governments, will be obliged to go out into the open market and purchase what we allow thus to be absorbed at what will eventually amount to something like $3,000,000 to the Government of the United States unless some speedy steps are taken to conserve this valuable resource.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not hear the concluding suggestion of the Senator from Montana. Does he object?

Mr. WALSH. I shall feel impelled to bring this bill to the attention of the Senate at the very earliest opportunity; and much as I regret being put in that position, I shall be obliged to object to the consideration of any other measure before the radium bill is considered by the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. My present request is that the bill to which I have referred be now brought before the Senate. I am temporarily leaving my resolution out of the question. Does the Senator from Montana object to taking up at this time the bill to which I have referred?

Mr. WALSH. How much time does the Senator think the bill will occupy?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think there will be any debate at all upon it, and I do not believe that it will require more than 15 minutes; but, of course, that is only an opinion. If, however, the Senate grants me leave to have the bill taken up now, it could not continue very long; but I do not want that done if it will be unsatisfactory to the Senators who are to speak this morning upon the tolls bill. Of course, in no event could the consideration of the bill continue beyond 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRANDEGEE in the chair). The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 4522. Is there objection?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have just entered the Chamber. Is the bill to which the Senator refers the one relating to bills of lading?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is a bill intended to restore the law as it was in most of the States prior to 1906, so that common carriers can not limit their liability.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the number and title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. It is Order of Business No. 346, being the bill (S. 4522) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to regulate commerce,' approved February 4, 1887, and all acts amendatory thereof, and to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission," approved June 29, 1906.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, as I entered the Chamber I was informed that the purpose of the Senator from Iowa was to have this bill in some way made the unfinished business.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have asked for unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of the bill at this time. Of course, that will not make it the unfinished business.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I wish to say that as the trust bill will probably come up immediately after the tolls bill shall have been disposed of I shall be compelled to object to the consideration of any bill which will interfere with the consideration of that bill, but as it is believed this bill will only take a short time—and I share in that belief—I have no objection to the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, before any consent of that kind is given we want some assurance that no considerable length of time will be occupied by the consideration of this bill. The Panama tolls bill is before the Senate as the unfinished business. It is highly desirable that that be given the right of way this week. If the bill referred to by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] could be disposed of in a few moments in a formal way, I would not object; but I can not consent to anything that will take any considerable length of time, which would stand in the way of the Panama tolls bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. I repeat that I have never encountered any objection to the bill except from the representatives of the railroad companies. Whether the objection that was made to the bill by the railroad companies in the committee will appear in the Senate I do not know; but I believe that it will not. If it does not, it will require but a very few minutes to dispose of the bill.

Mr. KERN. With that understanding, I shall not object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know what bill it is unanimous consent for the consideration of which is asked. Therefore I am making objection to the bill independent of it. I think we ought to get a vote on the tolls bill before we open the Senate to the consideration of anything else. I therefore object.

Mr. CUMMINS. Now, Mr. President, I insist upon my resolution. I am, of course, conscious that a single objection will take it over one day, but I intend to insist upon it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 384), as follows:

Resolved, That immediately after the final disposition of the bill now the unfinished business the Senate take up for consideration Senate bill 4522, to amend the interstate-commerce act relative to liability of common carriers.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I would ask the Senator from Iowa if by that he expects to displace the naval appropriation bill? If so, I shall certainly oppose the resolution.

Mr. CUMMINS. The consequences of adopting this resolution every Senator knows as well as I. The Senator from Louisiana, however, must be conscious that the naval appropriation bill will in all probability be disposed of long before the tolls bill is voted on. I have no doubt that the appropriation bill will be very speedily voted upon, whereas the tolls bill will probably not be voted on until the latter part of this week, and perhaps not so soon as that. My resolution simply gives this bill a specific place after the disposition of the tolls bill.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, at 1 o'clock automatically the Panama Canal tolls bill comes before the Senate, unless it is placed before it by unanimous consent prior to that time. Just as soon as the discussion of the Panama Canal tolls bill is finished for the day I shall be obliged to insist on bringing up the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. CUMMINS. This resolution does not interfere with that.

Mr. THORNTON. I do not know how long the consideration of the resolution will last.

Mr. CUMMINS. This resolution does not in any way interfere with the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have never known the unfinished business to be provided for by resolution. I have known a special order to be made which would give a day in court to a particular bill; but if we are to provide that after one unfinished business is disposed of another shall be taken up, we can see exactly what that will lead to. For that reason I must object to the consideration of the resolution for the day at least.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my resolution does not make the bill referred to therein the unfinished business, nor does it attempt to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the resolution goes over for the day.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST PACKAGES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 363) submitted by Mr. SMITH of Georgia on May 14, 1914, as follows:

Whereas on August 24, 1912, a joint committee on postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for transportation of mails was authorized to investigate and report upon the rates, etc., paid to the railroad companies for the carriage of mail matter; and

Whereas the matter carried by the parcel post is of a character that can be handled in a different class of car and at cheaper rates than ordinary mail matter; and

Whereas it is of great importance that the Post Office Department should have an opportunity to readjust its contracts for mail transportation, with a view of providing economical and suitable accommodations for the transportation of parcel-post packages: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the joint committee on postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for transportation of mails be requested to report at as early a day as possible the result of their investigations and their findings.

Resolved further, That the joint committee on postage on second-class mail matter and compensation for transportation of mails be requested to advise the Senate of the time at which they will be able to make their report.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over until Thursday next, without losing its position. It is possible that by that time it may be unnecessary to press it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will go over until Thursday next.

NEW YORK CENTRAL & HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD CO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 382) submitted by Mr. NORRIS on May 28, 1914, as follows:

Whereas the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co., through its ownership of the stock of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., forms a continuous line of railway from Chicago, through Buffalo, to New York City; and

Whereas said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls by lease the West Shore Railroad Co.; and the said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. owns the stock of the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. (Nickel Plate), which, together with the said West Shore Railroad Co., constitutes a railroad running parallel to the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. and the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. from Chicago, through Buffalo, to New York City; and

Whereas the New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. owns the stock in the Michigan Central Railway Co., a line of railway extending from Chicago to Buffalo; and

Whereas said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. owns the stock in the Western Transit Co. and the Rutland Transit Co., constituting a water-navigation line engaged in interstate commerce between Buffalo and Chicago and intermediate points; and

Whereas this ownership results in a combination under one control of four competing lines of transportation between Chicago and Buffalo and two competing lines between Buffalo and New York City; and

Whereas the said Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co., in addition to the ownership of the said New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., owns all of the stock of the Toledo & Ohio Central Railway Co.; of the Chicago, Indiana & Southern Railroad Co.; and of the Jamestown, Franklin & Clearfield Railroad Co.; and also owns more than 50 per cent of the stock of the Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co.; and

Whereas the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. controls the Western Maryland Railway Co., which, together with the said Pittsburgh & Lake Erie Railroad Co., constitutes another competing line between territory covered by the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway Co. and the New York, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co. with the Atlantic seaboard; and

Whereas the said New York Central & Hudson River Railroad Co. is now taking the necessary steps to more completely consolidate all of the aforesaid railroads, together with others, under one ownership and control: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the various combinations of railroads above set forth are in violation of the Sherman antitrust law or any other statute of the United States, and whether the Department of Justice has in contemplation any action for the dissolution of said combinations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does the Senator from North Carolina insist upon his motion?

Mr. OVERMAN. I certainly do, Mr. President. I have examined the record and have noticed that when we were in the minority such resolutions were always referred to a committee, and I think this resolution should be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. I do not care to say anything more about it; the resolution has been debated here at length.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no desire to debate it, and I am not going to do so; but on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent. On that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], I vote "yea."

Mr. GRONNA. I inquire if the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON] has voted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. GRONNA. I have a general pair with that Senator. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I shall have to withhold my vote. Were I permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES subsequently said: Mr. President, it has occurred to me that I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I inadvertently voted on the question of referring to the committee the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]; but inasmuch as my vote would not change the result one way or the other, it can stand without any injury. I simply wish to make this statement in justice to myself.

MIGRATORY BIRD LAW.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I have a copy of a decision rendered by the district judge of the eastern district of Arkansas in the Federal migratory bird law case. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if this was not printed last week in the RECORD?

Mr. BRYAN. It was not. A brief account, setting forth the facts that the law had been held unconstitutional by this district judge, was printed. This is the text of the opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the full text?

Mr. BRYAN. Yes.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

United States v. Harvey C. Shauver. W. H. Martin, Esq., United States district attorney, and J. H. Acklen, of Nashville, Tenn., for the United States; E. L. Westbrook, of Jonesboro, Ark., for the defendant. Trieber, district judge.

The defendant demurs to the indictment in this cause, which charges him with a violation of that part of the appropriation act for the Department of Agriculture approved March 4, 1913 (37 Stat., 828, 847), known as the migratory birds provision, and the regulations made by the Department of Agriculture in pursuance thereof, and which have been approved by the President. That provision reads:

"All wild geese, wild swans, brant, wild ducks, snipe, plover, woodcock, rail, wild pigeons, and all other migratory game and insectivorous birds which in their northern and southern migrations pass through or do not remain permanently the entire year within the borders of any State or territory, shall hereafter be deemed to be within the custody and protection of the Government of the United States, and shall not be destroyed or taken contrary to regulations hereinafter provided therefor.

"The Department of Agriculture is hereby authorized and directed to adopt suitable regulations to give effect to the previous paragraph by prescribing and fixing closed seasons, having due regard to the zones of temperature, breeding habits, and times and line of migratory flight, thereby enabling the department to select and designate suitable districts for different portions of the country, and it shall be unlawful to shoot or by any device kill or seize and capture migratory birds within the protection of this law during said closed seasons, and any person who shall violate any of the provisions or regulations of this law for the protection of migratory birds shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be fined not more than $100 or imprisoned not more than 90 days, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"The Department of Agriculture, after the preparation of said regulations, shall cause the same to be made public, and shall allow a period of three months in which said regulations may be examined and considered before final adoption, permitting, when deemed proper, public hearings thereon, and after final adoption shall cause the same to be engrossed and submitted to the President of the United States for approval: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to affect or interfere with the local laws of the States and Territories for the protection of nonmigratory game or other birds resident and breeding within their borders, nor to prevent the States and Territories from enacting laws and regulations to promote and render efficient the regulations of the Department of Agriculture provided under this statute."

In pursuance of this authority, the Department of Agriculture has adopted suitable regulations, which have been approved by the President.

GROUND FOR DEMURRER.

That the National Constitution is an enabling instrument, and therefore Congress possesses only such powers as are expressly or by necessary implication granted by that instrument, is not questioned. Unless, therefore, there is some provision in the National Constitution granting to Congress, either expressly or by necessary implication, the power to legislate on this subject the act can not be sustained.

The deference due from the judiciary to the other coordinate departments of the Government has made the courts, when the constitutionality of an act of the legislative department is attacked, to yield rather than encroach on the legislative domain. Only if the question is practically free from real doubt will the courts declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional. The fact that the statute goes to the verge of the constitutional power is not enough; it must appear clearly that it is beyond that power to justify a court to declare it void. These principles are so well settled by an unbroken line of decisions of all the American courts that it is unnecessary to cite authorities to sustain them.

It is equally well settled that as to all internal affairs the States retained their police power, which they as sovereign nations possessed prior to the adoption of the National Constitution, and no such powers were granted to the Nation. (Cooley Const. Lim., 574; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S., 501–503; Covington, etc., Bridge Co. v. Kentucky, 154 U. S., 204, 310; United States v. Boyer (D. C.), 85 Fed., 425, 434.) But it is now equally well settled that the United States does possess what is analogous to the police power, which every sovereign nation possesses as to its own property (Camfield v. United States, 167 U. S. 518, 525), and to carry into effect those powers which the Constitution has conferred upon it. (In re Debs, 158 U. S., 564, 581; Light v. United States, 220 U. S., 523, 536; Hoke v. United States, 227 U. S., 308, 323.)

It is not claimed by counsel for the Government that the power to enact such legislation exists under the commerce clause of the Constitution, but it is claimed that subsection 2 of section 3, Article IV, of the Constitution, which is as follows, grants the necessary power:

"The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States or of any particular State."

IMPLIED ATTRIBUTE.

It is also claimed that it is one of those implied attributes of sovereignty in which the National Government has concurrent jurisdiction with the States; that it is a dormant right in the National Government, and where the State is clearly incompetent to save itself the National Government has the right to aid. To sustain the latter proposition stress is laid on the fact that it is impossible for any State to enact laws for the protection of migratory wild game, and only the National Government can do it with any fair degree of success, consequently the power must be national and vested in the Congress of the United States. A similar argument was presented to the court in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46, 89), but held untenable. Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, disposed of it by saying:

"But the proposition that there are legislative powers affecting the Nation as a whole which belong to, although not expressed in the grant of powers, is in direct conflict with the doctrine that this is a Government of enumerated powers. That this is such a Government clearly appears from the Constitution, independently of the amendment, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This is the natural construction of the original body of the Constitution, independently of the amendment, for otherwise there would be an instrument granting certain specified things made operative to grant other and distinct things. This natural construction of the original body of the Constitution is made absolutely certain by the tenth amendment. This amendment, which was seemingly adopted with prescience of just such a contention as the present, disclosed the widespread fear that the National Government might, under the pressure of a supposed general welfare, attempt to exercise powers which had not been granted. With equal determination the framers intended that no such assumption should ever find justification in the organic act, and that if in the future further powers seemed necessary, they should be granted by the people in the manner they had provided for amending that act. Its principal purpose was not the distribution of power between the United States and the States, but a reservation to the people of all powers not granted."

This disposes of that contention.

Are migratory birds, when in a State on their usual migration, the property of the United States or of the State where they are found? If they are the property of the Nation, the States would have no power to regulate, control, or prohibit the hunting or killing of them. But the rule of law, which all the American courts have recognized, is that animals feræ naturæ, denominated as game, are owned by the States, not as proprietors, but in their sovereign capacity as the representatives and for the benefit of all their people in concern. This principle has not only been maintained by all the highest courts of the States in which the question has arisen, but has had the approval of the Supreme Court of the United States in every case which has come before it. (Martin v. Waddell, 6 Pet., 367; McCready v. Virginia, 94 U. S., 391; Smith v. Maryland, 18 How., 71, 74; Manchester v. Massachusetts, 139 U. S., 240, 358; Lawton v. Steele, 152 U. S., 133; Geer v. Connecticut, 161 U. S., 519; The Abby Dodge, 223 U. S., 166.)

DECISIONS CITED.

In McCready v. Virginia it was said:

"In like manner the States own the tidewaters themselves and the fish in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running. For this purpose the State represents its people, and the ownership is that of the people in their united sovereignty."

It is true that this quotation was not absolutely necessary for the determination of the issues in that case, but the question of ownership of the fish in tidewater was indirectly involved, and the learned chief justice who delivered the opinion of the court evidently deemed it necessary to determine it.

In Manchester v. Massachusetts a statute of Massachusetts regulating the fishing of menhaden in Buzzards Bay was involved, and it was there held:

"We think it must be regarded as established that as between nations the minimum limit of the territorial jurisdiction of a nation over tidewaters is a marine league from its coast; that bays wholly within its territory not exceeding 2 marine leagues in width at mouth are within this limit; and that included in this territorial jurisdiction is the right of control over fisheries, whether the fish be migratory, free-swimming fish, or free-moving fish, or fish attached to or imbedded in the soil."

In that case the court also quoted with approval from Dunham v. Lamphere, 3 Gray, 268:

"That in the distribution of powers between the General and State Governments the right to the fisheries and the power to regulate the fisheries on the coast and in the tidewaters of the State were left by the Constitution of the United States with the States, subject only to such powers as Congress may justly exercise in the regulation of commerce, foreign and domestic."

In Martin v. Waddell, after a careful review of the English authorities, it was expressly held that "the public common or piscary belongs to the people in their united sovereignty, and the State holds it in trust for them."

Geer v. Connecticut may well be considered the leading case on this subject, as it reviews very learnedly all the law pertaining thereto. Mr. Justice White (now Mr. Chief Justice) reviewed not only the law as it existed under the common law, but under the laws of Solon, the law as it is found in the Institute of Justinian, the Civil and Salic Law, and the Code of Napoleon, and sustained a statute of the State of Connecticut prohibiting the killing of certain game at any time when intended to be conveyed beyond the limits of the State. After reviewing all the authorities, the learned justice summarized the law as follows:

"The foregoing analysis of the principles upon which alone rests the right of an individual to acquire a qualified ownership in game and the power of the State deducible therefrom to control such ownership for the common benefit, clearly demonstrates the validity of the statute of the State of Connecticut here in controversy. The sole consequence of the provision forbidding the transportation of game killed within the State beyond the State is to confine the use of such game to those who own it, the people of that State."

AS TO CONSTITUTIONALITY.

In Sils v. Hesterberg (211 U. S., 31) the constitutionality of the New York statute prohibiting the possession of game at certain times was attacked as violative of the National Constitution. That the State was the owner of all the game in the State, whether migratory or not, was not questioned by those attacking the statute, but it was claimed that the State had no power to prohibit the possession of game in the closed season when imported from a foreign country or another State where the killing is not prohibited. The statute was sustained as a proper exercise of the police power to protect the game in the interest of the food supply of the people of that State.

In the Abby Dodge case the principles laid down in the McCready case, that "each State owns the beds of all tidewaters within its jurisdiction unless they have been granted away; also the tidewaters themselves and the fishes in them, so far as they are capable of ownership while running," is reaffirmed.

In Judson on interstate commerce, section 11, the author states the law to be:

"Thus the wild game within a State at common law belongs to the sovereign, and in this country to the people in their collective capacity, and the State therefore has a right to say that it shall not become the subject of commerce."

Even after the game has been reduced to possession there is but a qualified ownership in it, subject to the control of the State. Phelps v. Racey (60 N. Y., 10); Commonwealth v. Savage (155 Mass., 278); Organ v. State (56 Ark., 270); State v. Geer (69 Conn., 144, affirmed in 161 U. S., 519); State v. Northern Pacific Express Co. (58 Minn., 403); State v. Rodman (58 Minn., 393; American Express Co. v. Peoples (133 Ill., 649); ex parte Mayer (103 Cal., 476); People v. Collison (85 Mich., 105); in re Deininger (108 Fed. (C. C.), 623).

The act of Congress of May 25, 1900, chapter 553 (31 Stat., 188), known as the Lacey Act, the constitutionality of which has been sustained—Rupart v. United States (181 Fed., 104; C. C. A., 255)—in effect legalizes the statutes of the States for the control of wild game within their borders whether migratory or not. People v. Hesterberg (184 N. Y., 126).

The claim that the migratory birds are the property of the United States must therefore be held untenable.

It is also argued that Congress has frequently exercised the power to regulate matters which could only have been done under the general police power, and the validity of these acts when attacked as beyond the power of Congress has been upheld. Counsel refers to the lottery acts, the antitrust acts, the national railway legislation, the safety-appliance act, the quarantine laws, the pure food and drugs act, the act regulating mailable articles, and other acts of similar nature. But every one of these acts was upheld under some provision of the Constitution, either that of the Post Office Department, the commerce clause, the taxing power, or some other grant. Whenever Congress or the head of a department went beyond that power, as by including intrastate carriage with interstate, the acts were declared unconstitutional. Trade-mark cases (100 U. S., 92); Illinois Central Railway Co. v. McKendree (203 U. S., 514). The Employees' Liability cases (207 U. S., 463).

It may be, as contended on behalf of the Government, that only by national legislation can migratory wild game and fish be preserved to the people, but that is not a matter for the court. It is the people who alone can amend the Constitution to grant Congress the power to enact such legislation as they deem necessary. All the courts are authorized to do when the constitutionality of legislative acts is questioned is to determine whether Congress, under the Constitution as it is, possesses the power to enact the legislation in controversy; their power does not extend to the matter of expediency. If Congress has not the power, the duty of the court is to declare the act void. The court is unable to find any provision in the Constitution authorizing Congress, either expressly or by necessary implication, to protect or regulate the shooting of migratory wild game when in a State, and is therefore forced to the conclusion that the act is unconstitutional. The demurrer to the indictment will be sustained.

TRIEBER, Presiding Judge.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR SMOOT (S. DOC. NO. 487).

Mr. OVERMAN. I ask to have printed as a document the address delivered by the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] at the memorial exercises held on Saturday last at Arlington, Va.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

THE LAW OF PARDON.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I desire to present and ask for the publication as a public document of a little work by Prof. James D. Barnett, professor of political science at the University of Oregon, on the subject of the law of pardon. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

DEMOCRATS MUST PROGRESS.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask that an article from the News-Scimitar, of Memphis, Tenn., entitled "Democrats must progress," upon the subject of the importance of taking up constructive legislation with reference to the development of our rivers, may be printed in the RECORD. It is only half a column in length.

Mr. GALLINGER. What did I understand the Senator to say was the title—"Democrats must progress"?

Mr. NEWLANDS. "Democrats must progress." It dwells upon the importance of taking up constructive measures with reference to the development of our rivers.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if there is any hope in that direction, the document ought to be printed. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the article on progress will be printed.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEMOCRATS MUST PROGRESS.

Is the future of the national Democratic Party assured? Will the tariff law so reduce the cost of living as to win the plaudits of the masses for the now dominant party? Will the currency law so readjust individual opportunity as to reduce or abate the complained-of evils of concentrated wealth? Or does the great piece of constructive legislation upon which the Democratic Party must rely for continued success at the polls yet remain to be enacted?

These questions more and more are arising in the public mind, and the time for the well-wishers of the party to answer them is now, not after the issue has been drawn and the voters are on their way to the polls.

It is, of course, too early to know with precision what the effect of the tariff law is to be. Democrats generally believe it will do far more good than harm. Republicans generally believe it will do more harm than good. Time alone can settle the issue.

The currency law, by reason of the action of the committee in the placing of the regional reserve banks, has, at the inception of its application, developed much antagonism in various cities.

The President's policy with reference to the Panama Canal tolls question is opposed by many Democrats and Republicans alike.

So it would seem, on the face of the returns thus far, that the future of the party is not yet assured; that the piece of constructive legislation on which the country as a whole can agree is nationally beneficial in a great, big way is yet to be made a law.

The building of the Panama Canal made Roosevelt.

The scientific development of the natural resources of the United States will make Wilson. President Wilson probably appreciates this opportunity, but the Senators and Representatives, as a body, do not as yet seem to have awakened to the fact.

The problems of forestry, soil protection, irrigation, power development, water pollution, and inland navigation are closely linked with the problems of national drainage and flood prevention. The platform pledges of the Democratic Party cover these problems. The public need is urgent. There are vast areas of fertile lands to be protected against overflow; other vast areas need the waters that now go to waste in floods; hydroelectric power development must be depended on more and more as a potential economy of national endeavor.

These problems have been studied scientifically and intelligently by advanced thinkers during many years past, and the thought of such men has been given expression in a splendidly constructive measure known as the Newlands-Broussard river regulation and flood prevention bill. That bill is now awaiting action by Congress.

Its purpose is to give the scientific bureaus of the Federal Government the authority to initiate plans and projects, and the money and power to carry them out, for the control of the drainage of the country, thus relieving drought-menaced and flood-menaced sections, checking soil erosion, correcting the underground water supply, and at the same time developing an enormous continuing national asset of timber, of power, and of inland all-the-year navigable waterways.

Such legislation will live as a perpetual monument to the wisdom of the political party securing it. The toilers of the land will learn to appreciate its benefits more and more. The prosperity of the Nation will increase as a result of it.

The welfare of the country requires such legislation.

So it would seem the part of wisdom for the party in power to enact it with no more delay than is necessary and rest its hope for the future thereon.

THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER (S. DOC. NO. 486).

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate resolution 358, which has been reported favorably by the Committee on Printing, providing for the publication as a Senate document of an article by Mr. Barnett E. Moses, entitled "The Problem of the Mississippi River." The cost of the printing will be $36.98, and the cost of each additional thousand copies will be $4.00. I ask that the resolution be amended so as to provide for the printing of 5,000 copies.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator from Nevada whether this document has been already printed, and whether this is an additional edition?

Mr. NEWLANDS. No; it has not been printed. It is a very excellent article.

Mr. BURTON. Who is the author or writer?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. Barnett E. Moses, of the Memphis bar. This is a very able article, relating to "The Problem of the Mississippi River," and I have received numerous requests that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. BURTON. What is it about—the improvement of the river for navigation?

Mr. NEWLANDS. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Or the matter of protection against floods?

Mr. NEWLANDS. The improvement of the river for navigation and also for the conservation of the adjoining lands.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the words "5,000 copies of."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the resolution by inserting, in line 1, after the word "That," the words "5,000 copies of," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That 5,000 copies of the manuscript submitted by Mr. NEWLANDS on March 5, 1914, entitled "The Problem of the Mississippi River," by Mr. Barnett E. Moses, of the Memphis bar, be printed as a Senate document.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business, the Panama Canal tolls bill, may be taken up for consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, by agreement with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], I will waive the commencement of my remarks at the present time so that he may deliver an address which he says probably will not exceed 30 minutes; and by an understanding between him and myself and the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] we will defer to that Senator in order that he may introduce an amendment to the bill and submit a few remarks thereon. I wish to have it understood, however, that I do not lose my right to proceed at the close of the remarks of the junior Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. PITTMAN. I offer an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Add a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. The President of the United States may at any time by proclamation reduce the rate of tolls to be paid by vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States passing through the Panama Canal, or may exempt such vessels from the payment of any tolls, when he is satisfied that such act is advisable for the purpose of securing or maintaining entire equality in the use of the canal and of preventing discrimination against such coastwise vessels: Provided, That neither the passage of this act nor anything therein contained shall be construed to waive or impair any treaty or other right possessed by the United States.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, by the courtesy of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] I have been allowed just a few minutes to make a brief statement. It will take me only about two minutes.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of enabling the President at all times and under every condition to protect the subjects of all nations, including the subjects of the United States, in the use of the canal "on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects," as stated in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The following is submitted in support of the amendment:

First. The treaty does not prescribe that the ships of all nations shall be charged the same rate of tolls, but, on the contrary, provides that the terms shall be such "that there shall be no discrimination."

Two. It is the duty of both parties to the treaty to prevent discrimination in favor of the citizens of either in the use of the canal.

Third. If the exemption from payment of tolls of coastwise vessels passing through the canal would be a discrimination against vessels of British subjects paying the tolls, then it must follow that if the vessels of both countries were required to pay tolls, and Great Britain repaid the amount of such tolls to its subjects and the United States did not repay the amount of such tolls to its citizens, there would be a discrimination in favor of the vessels of the subjects of Great Britain and against the vessels of the citizens of the United States to the amount of the tolls so charged. It is immaterial by whom such tolls were paid so long as not paid by the subjects owning or operating such vessels or charged with such expense. The fact would remain that the vessels of the subjects of Great Britain would be under less burden in passing through the canal, and to such extent would have an advantage over the citizens of the United States.

Fourth. If the vessels of the subjects and citizens of both countries should pay the same rate of tolls, then "entire equality" could only be preserved and "discrimination" prevented by the same rate of refund or subsidy made or granted by both of such countries to its citizens.

Fifth. Great Britain can bring about this equality and eliminate such discrimination by not subsidizing its vessels passing through the canal. The United States, being opposed to direct subsidies, can only secure such equality by reducing the tolls on the vessels of its citizens by an amount equal to the subsidy received by the subjects of Great Britain, or increasing the rate of tolls to be paid by such subsidized vessels, or by preventing subsidized vessels from passing through the canal.

If Great Britain repaid its subjects in the form of a subsidy the full amount of the tolls paid by them, then the United States to avoid such discrimination would be compelled to exempt its citizens from the payment of any tolls. If the British subsidy should be equal to only one-half of such tolls, then the reduction of tolls to citizens of the United States should be only one-half, so the equality could be maintained.

Sixth. If this construction of the treaty is adopted it is unnecessary to determine at this time the many other vexing and doubtful questions, such as whether or not the United States is included in the description "all nations" or whether or not the word "vessels" used in the treaty includes vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Without admitting that we have no right to exempt our coastwise vessels, we require such vessels to pay tolls until the President is satisfied that such payment is an unjust burden or permits a discrimination against citizens of the United States.

Seventh. This procedure is fully sustained by legislative precedents. By the Payne-Aldrich tariff law the President was authorized to collect the maximum tariff from any country which unduly discriminated against the United States or the products thereof or paid export bounty or export duty or prohibited exportation of articles to the United States, so as to unduly discriminate against the United States or its products, and in the absence of such discriminations to reduce the maximum tariff 25 per cent.

By the Underwood-Simmons tariff law power of protection against such discrimination was granted in the following language:

That whenever any country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government shall pay or bestow, directly or indirectly, any bounty or grant upon the exportation of any article or merchandise from such country, dependency, colony, province, or other political subdivision of government, and such article or merchandise is dutiable under the provisions of this act, then upon the importation of any such article or merchandise into the United States, whether the same shall be imported directly from the country of production or otherwise, and whether such article or merchandise is imported in the same condition as when exported from the country of production or has been changed in condition by remanufacture or otherwise, there shall be levied and paid in all such cases, in addition to the duties otherwise imposed by this act, an additional duty equal to the net amount of such bounty or grant, however the same be paid or bestowed.

Mr. CATRON. I yield for the present to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. COLT. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the repeal of the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act because I believe that law places us in an indefensible position before the nations of the world in regard to our treaty obligations; because I believe that the law violates the meaning and intent of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and because I think that, independent of any treaty, the Panama Canal, like the Suez Canal, should be free and open in time of peace to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality.

The vital question in dispute under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the question of equality of treatment of all vessels passing through the canal, and by this free-tolls provision we have, arbitrarily and without submitting the question to arbitration, made inequality of treatment the law of the land. In a great international controversy, in which the whole world takes the deepest interest, we have entered judgment in our own favor without the consent of the other party and without giving the other party an opportunity to be heard.

We have taken this action notwithstanding the fact that a treaty is a solemn contract between independent nations, that its obligations are equally binding upon each of the high contracting parties, and that the fulfillment of these obligations rests alone upon honor and good faith.

We have taken this action notwithstanding the fact that where a treaty, owing to the inherent imperfection of language, is capable of two interpretations, and honest differences arise between the contracting parties as to which is the proper interpretation. The United States, in the interest of peace and good will among nations, has been the foremost advocate and champion of the principle that these differences should be submitted to arbitration; and that owing largely to our efforts this principle of arbitration has become an established canon of international law.

We have taken this action notwithstanding the fact that conflicting and irreconcilable differences of opinion exist as to the true interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and that under one interpretation this exemption is a violation of the treaty, and that under another interpretation it is not a violation.

We have taken this action notwithstanding the fact that the legal effect of this exemption is to modify or change the treaty according to the interpretation of the other contracting party.

We all know the legal effect of a later statute upon a treaty. Under the Constitution of the United States, statutes and treaties made in pursuance thereof are the supreme law of the land. Statutes are made by the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives. Treaties are made by the President and the Senate. Statutes are therefore of equal, if not of greater, authority than treaties. It follows that treaties may be modified, changed, or repealed by acts of Congress. When a treaty and a later statute relate to the same subject the statute will control because it is the later expression of the will of Congress, the effect being that the statute then becomes the supreme law of the land, notwithstanding it may violate the terms of a treaty.

Head Money cases (112 U. S., 590, 599), Whitney v. Robertson (124 U. S., 190, 194, 195), and United States v. Lee Yan Tai (185 U. S., 213, 221).

In Whitney against Robertson the court said:

In Head Money cases it was objected to an act of Congress that it violated provisions contained in treaties with foreign nations, but the court replied that, so far as the provisions of the act were in conflict with any treaty, they must prevail in all the courts of the country; and after a full and elaborate consideration of the subject it held that, "so far as a treaty made by the United States with any foreign nation can be the subject of judicial cognizance in the courts of this country, it is subject to such acts as Congress may pass for its enforcement, modification, or repeal."

It is clear, then, that if the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and this statute should come before the Supreme Court for adjudication, the court must enforce the statute, although it conflicts with the treaty. What we have done, in legal effect, so far as the United States is concerned, is to insert in rule 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the words, "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," and to make these words controlling; and we have done this without the consent of Great Britain and against her protest.

What we have done has been to settle the vital question in controversy under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in our own favor by legislation instead of submitting the question to arbitration.

We stand before the world to-day in the case of this great international treaty of refusing to arbitrate and of substituting legislation. I believe this position is indefensible. I believe it is a violation of our treaty obligations toward Great Britain. I believe that it places us in a wrong position before the nations of the world with respect to treaty obligations. I believe this policy is destructive of the whole principle of arbitration, and I believe that the only honorable thing for the United States to do, before taking any other action, is to repeal this law.

Mr. President, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty presents a conflict between the rule of equality and the rule of inequality in the operation of the Panama Canal, and this conflict arises from two different interpretations of the treaty.

Under one interpretation equality is the controlling principle. Under the other interpretation ownership or sovereignty is the controlling principle.

Under one interpretation the canal must be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of equality. Under the other interpretation the canal must be free and open to the vessels of all nations on terms of equality, except the United States.

Under one interpretation the United States, being bound by this rule of equality, can not discriminate in favor of her own vessels. Under the other interpretation the United States, not being bound by this rule, can impose any terms she pleases on the passage of her own vessels through the canal. Under one interpretation this is an interoceanic canal open to the vessels of all nations on terms of equality. Under the other interpretation this is an American canal, to be operated for the benefit of the American people.

In seeking for the true interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we must ever keep in mind certain facts: The treaty relates to an isthmian canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The United States and Great Britain had made a former treaty relating to such a canal, known as the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. This was a treaty between Great Britain and the United States as mere users of the canal, under which they entered into an agreement of joint protection, neutralization, and absolute equality of rights. This treaty was made in 1850, and was succeeded by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in 1901.

The only other interoceanic canal in the world in 1901 was the Suez Canal. In 1888 the owners and the territorial sovereigns of the Suez Canal entered into an agreement as to the rules which should govern the use of this canal. These rules related to equality of treatment of all vessels and to neutralization.

Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States passed from the position of mere user under a former treaty to a position of owner, and in a provision inserted late in the final draft of the treaty to the possible position of territorial sovereign; and to-day the United States has realized everything which was possibly contemplated by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. She has become in fact the builder, the owner, and the territorial sovereign of this interoceanic canal.

Bearing in mind these facts the question of the proper interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty resolves itself into this inquiry: Did the United States in 1901 contract to abide by the rule of equality and substantially the rules of neutralization adopted in the case of the Suez Canal, or did she except herself from these rules and only agree to apply them to other nations?

In determining this question it is necessary that we should look at the conditions which existed at the time since the parties were only dealing with existing conditions.

It is not right, first, to fill our minds with the ideas of ownership, sovereignty, the enormous cost of the canal, transcontinental railroads, subsidies, and party platforms, and then to turn our eyes upon this treaty and see if by some possible construction we can not exclude the United States from the basic rule of equality.

We have before us simply a contract made in 1901, and the only question is what did the parties agree to at that time, and not what would the United States agree to in 1914.

The present controversy turns upon the proper construction of rule 1 of article 3 of the treaty:

ART. 3. The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

RULE 1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The battle ground of contention is over the meaning of the words "all nations" in rule 1, and the vital question in dispute is whether "all nations" mean all nations including the United States or all nations excluding the United States.

Now, it is true that "all nations" may be so interpreted as to include or exclude the United States. Let us turn for a moment to these two interpretations.

One interpretation is that in reading rule 1 the natural and common-sense meaning of the rule is that "all nations" means all nations, and not all nations except the United States; and this seems clearly to be the meaning when rule 1 is read in connection with the introductory paragraph of article 3, which immediately precedes, in which the United States "adopts"—that is, takes as its own—the "following rules."

There is, however, another interpretation which may be given to this rule and to the words "all nations." If you start with the idea of ownership by the United States and supplement this with the words "observing these rules," and with the words "such nation" following a little later, it is not difficult to reach the construction that this is the case of a proprietor of a canal agreeing to terms of equality with respect to his customers or the users of the canal, and that this in no way binds the proprietor himself to these terms, and, hence, that "all nations" mean all other nations and do not include the United States.

While this is a possible construction of rule 1, it seems strained, and when you consider that the words "observing these rules" were not in the first draft of the treaty and were put there at the instance of Great Britain for a special reason, not material to this inquiry, the interpretation that "all nations" do not include the United States becomes still more artificial.

Looking at this question from the standpoint of 1901 and not of 1914, and remembering that on the face of the treaty the minds of the contracting parties met on the basis of the Suez convention, I think that the surrounding conditions and circumstances demonstrate beyond a reasonable doubt that it was the intention of the parties to include the United States in the rule of equality, and that "all nations" in rule 1 includes the United States. Let me summarize these facts:

First. The free and equal use of navigable channels and waterways has been the traditional policy of the United States for more than 100 years, as shown in the recent notable speech of the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

Second. The free and equal use of an isthmian canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by all nations on terms of absolute equality has been the settled and uniform policy of the United States for more than 80 years.

The evidence on this point is overwhelming. It is found in presidential messages, instructions by Secretaries of State, resolutions by both Houses of Congress, and in treaties. We may here cite several of these expressions:

The free and equal right of navigating such canal to all such nations on the payment of such reasonable tolls.

To secure to all nations the free and equal right of passage over the Isthmus.

Construction of a great highway dedicated to the use of all nations on equal terms.

For the benefit of mankind on equal terms for all.

Must be for the world's benefit—a trust for mankind.

We may well close these few citations with a quotation from Secretary Blaine's letter to Mr. Lowell:

Nor does the United States seek any exclusive or narrow commercial advantage. It frankly agrees, and will by public proclamation declare at the proper time, in conjunction with the Republic on whose soil the canal may be located, that the same rights and privileges, the same tolls and obligations for the use of the canal, shall apply with absolute impartiality to the merchant marine of every nation on the globe.

Third. For 50 years, from 1850 to 1901, the United States and Great Britain were bound together by a treaty relating to an Isthmian Canal, the basic principle of which was the rule of equality in respect to the ships, citizens, and subjects of both countries; and this general principle was carried into the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a guide for its interpretation.

Fourth. The United States—and this is the most vital fact of all—adopted in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the rule of equality of the Suez Convention, of 1888. This was an agreement between Great Britain and the other European powers who owned the Suez Canal, and Turkey and Egypt, the territorial sovereigns, by which they all bound themselves to the rule of equality as to the vessels of all nations passing through the canal.

Here was the only analogy which the contracting parties had to go by. Here was the only interoceanic canal in the world, and the owners and territorial sovereigns had agreed that all nations should be treated on terms of absolute equality; and we find this basic rule carried into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as Rule 1. Is it conceivable that Great Britain understood that the United States, the prospective builder, owner, and possible territorial sovereign of another interoceanic canal, excepted herself from this rule of equality in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? The owners and territorial sovereigns of the only existing interoceanic canal had voluntarily agreed, in the interests of commerce and civilization, to include themselves in this rule of equality, and could the United States do less with respect to its projected interoceanic canal? And is it not incredible that Great Britain, with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty still in force with its basic rule of equality, should have consented to the making of a new treaty in which the United States was to be exempted from the rule? And is it not perfectly natural that the American negotiators, having in mind the settled policy of the United States in regard to an Isthmian Canal, and having before them the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and having also before them what Europe had done with respect to the Suez Canal, should have agreed to adopt the same rule of equality in respect to our Isthmian Canal?

Fifth. But in addition to all this we have the positive testimony of Mr. Choate and Mr. White, two of the American negotiators, that the United States was included in the rule of equality, that this was the basic principle which Great Britain insisted upon during all of the negotiations, and that this rule "excludes the possibility of exemption of any kind of vessels of the United States."

This chain is complete. There is no weak link in it, and the mind is convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that if we construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty according to the intent of the contracting parties the United States was included in the words "all nations" and bound herself to observe the basic rule of equality.

There is another, but far less fundamental, contention in regard to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

It is claimed that "vessels of commerce," in rule 1, do not include coastwise vessels, and nothing in support of this proposition can be added to the argument of the junior Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] in his recent speech. This contention, however, rests on the arbitrary rule of international law that the term "vessels of commerce" in treaties is always understood to exclude coastwise vessels. If this is an inflexible rule to which there can be no exception, it is difficult to reconcile it with the fact that the United States and Great Britain, in numerous treaties, have been careful specifically to exclude coastwise vessels.

Furthermore, I do not think this is an absolutely inflexible rule that must be applied to all treaties. I believe the true rule is that each treaty should be considered by itself in order to determine this question.

Now, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty relates to a great interoceanic canal; it relates to oceans and continents, and not to rivers, bays, and coast lines, and I think that the broad rule of equality, which is the foundation stone of this treaty, was intended to embrace every vessel flying any flag which passes through this canal. I believe that in the contemplation of this treaty all vessels are over-seas vessels.

If, then, all vessels passing through this canal are over-seas vessels and are included in this class, it is plain that American coastwise vessels are over-seas vessels within the meaning of this treaty, and hence that the exemption of these coastwise vessels would operate as a discrimination against the vessels of other nations. The rule laid down by the Supreme Court in Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) was based entirely upon the proposition that the exemption in that case did not operate as a discrimination, and that case therefore has no application, in my opinion, to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty as originally framed was a contract between the United States as the prospective builder and proprietor of an isthmian canal and Great Britain, by which the United States agreed to adopt the basis rule of equality in the operation of the canal. This was the first draft of the treaty, and no changes in the subsequent draft in any way affected this rule of equality.

There was, however, an amendment inserted in the final draft which is of great importance. The first draft was dated in 1900, and in October, 1901, just before the final draft was submitted, this provision was added:

ART. 4. It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

Under this provision the United States passes from a prospective proprietor of a canal to a prospective sovereign of the territory on which the canal is built, and this covenant binds the United States to the obligations of the treaty in case she should ever become the territorial sovereign.

The United States had already bound herself as builder and owner, and she now binds herself as territorial sovereign, just as Turkey and Egypt bound themselves as territorial sovereigns in the Suez convention of 1888.

But this covenant did not extend any further than the obligations mentioned in the treaty comprising the rules of equality and neutralization. All her other rights of sovereignty were preserved and are now preserved to the United States just as much as the rights of sovereignty are preserved to Turkey and Egypt under articles 10 and 13 of the Suez convention.

Mr. President, when you have found that an interpretation of a contract agrees with the intention of the parties, all its parts will harmonize with that interpretation. And this is true in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; every part of it, the preamble, the body of the treaty, and the end, are found to harmonize with the basic rule of equality. On the other hand, if an interpretation is at variance with the real intention of the parties, there is often much trouble in ascertaining the meaning of some of the provisions of the contract. And this is true of those who believe that the United States is excepted from the great principle of equality embodied in rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Let me illustrate this by two notable addresses, one by a most profound lawyer and eminent statesman, and the other by an accomplished jurist and a distinguished Member of this body.

With respect to the provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty providing that no change of territorial sovereignty shall affect the obligations under the present treaty, Richard Olney says:

But the treaty of November 18, 1901, adds a clause * * * no change of territorial sovereignty of the country or countries traversed by the canal shall affect the obligations of the parties to the treaty, thus assenting in advance to the acquisition by the United States of the territory needed for the canal. Hence, since the United States did afterwards acquire the canal zone, the terms of the November Hay-Pauncefote treaty apply to the case of an artificial waterway constructed by a State on its own territory.

With respect to this provision the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] says:

The meaning of this provision is that the rights of the parties shall not be affected by a change in the sovereignty which may occur after the canal is constructed. * * * If sovereignty had been acquired by the United States after the construction of the canal, then this provision would be applicable. * * * The canal has been constructed on territory over which the United States exercises the power of sovereignty, while the canal contemplated by the treaty was to be built on alien soil, and therefore the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is wholly inapplicable.

Here are two irreconcilable constructions of this fundamental provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; according to one construction, this provision contemplated that the canal might be built on American territory, and according to the other construction the canal was to be built on alien territory.

Not only do Mr. Olney and the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] give a different interpretation of this provision, but each relies upon a different rule of international law.

Mr. Olney relies upon the rule that a nation constructing an artificial waterway within its own territory may prescribe the terms upon which other nations may use it.

Of course, this rule has no application if the nation agrees by treaty to include itself in a rule of equality of treatment for all nations.

The Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] in support of his interpretation relies on the rule of international law, rebus sic stantibus, that parties contract with respect to the conditions contemplated at the time, and that the obligations cease to be binding as soon as the conditions are essentially altered.

With respect to this rule it may be observed that the language of this provision in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is general, and, hence, applies to any change in territorial sovereignty; and, further, it appears from the official correspondence that this provision was inserted in the treaty by Great Britain to meet the very contingency of the United States becoming the territorial sovereign and of her then invoking the very rule now relied upon by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN].

Again Mr. Olney gives force and effect to the "'general principle' of neutralization" which was carried from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty into the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. On his construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, this "general principle" applied not to the proprietor of the canal, but only to the users of the canal, which was the status of the United States in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; and he maintains that the United States is giving full effect to this principle when it treats the users of the Panama Canal on terms of equality.

On the other hand, the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], as to this preamble, says:

> The reference to the "general principle" of neutralization in the preamble is, in a strict sense, no part of the treaty. It merely indicates the reason or the occasion for making it. A preamble can not of itself confer any power. * * * It can not be permitted to introduce doubt or uncertainty where otherwise none would exist.

It is apparent that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] gives little or no effect to the preamble as affording a guide to the interpretation of the treaty.

Again, Mr. Olney is of the opinion that the case of Olsen v. Smith (195 U. S., 332) bears no analogy and has no application to the "vessels of commerce" in rule 1 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

On the other hand, the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] relies upon this case as settling the law that coastwise vessels are not included in "vessels of commerce" in rule 1.

My conclusion is that any interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which excludes the United States from the rule of equality with respect to all vessels passing through the canal is contrary to the express terms of the treaty and the manifest intention of the high contracting parties.

Mr. President, I look upon the map of the world and I see two narrow strips of land which hold together great continents and divide great oceans.

It has been the dream of mankind for centuries that passageways might be cut through these narrow strips for the world's benefit. And mankind has demanded that if ever these stupendous undertakings were accomplished, if ever these canals were built, they should be dedicated to civilization and to the commerce of all nations, and that the vessels of all nations should have the right of passage through them on terms of absolute equality. Both of these mighty projects have now been accomplished and the dream of mankind has been realized.

I turn to the Suez Canal, the first of these world waterways to be built, and I find that Europe has recognized the demand of civilization and that this canal has been dedicated to mankind and the commerce of the world. I find that the great powers of Europe, the owners and the territorial sovereigns, entered into a solemn compact by which the use of this canal is secured to the vessels of all nations on terms of entire equality.

I now turn to the Panama Canal and to America, and I find that American genius, energy, and skill have accomplished the second of these vast achievements, and I find the nations of the world asking, What will America do? Will she dedicate this canal to civilization and to the commerce of all nations? Will she, as builder, owner, and territorial sovereign, do as Europe has done? Will she, too, recognize her duty to mankind and decree that the use of this canal shall be free and open to all nations on terms of absolute equality?

And then the thought comes to me: Oh, America, you have been carrying on the most remarkable experiment in government in the world's history. You have taught mankind that self-government is not a failure. You have demonstrated the possibility of an enduring democracy extending over a continent. You have made a Constitution which is the marvel of the world, and which holds in its strong and loving arms 48 imperial States. Your example is spreading democracy over the earth with irresistible force. You have grown big and rich and powerful, until your influence dominates this hemisphere; and at the foundation of all this greatness lies the rule of equality upon which your Government is based; and to-day the nations of the world are only asking you to apply this rule to all vessels which seek to pass from ocean to ocean through the Panama Canal.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President, the proposition under consideration to be acted upon by the United States Senate is, Shall the clause in the act to provide for the opening, maintenance, operation and protection of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the same, approved August 24, 1912, which says: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States" be repealed? And shall the other language with reference to the tolls be so amended as to absolutely preclude the United States from exempting United States vessels from paying tolls or lowering the tolls which they or any of them shall pay? This, it is claimed should be done on the theory that the language sought to be changed is in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, as we have been told by the President of the United States in his address made before us on March 5 of this year, in which he says:

> In my own judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view, and is, moreover, in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain concerning the canal concluded on November 18, 1901.

He also states in that address:

> The large thing to do is the only thing we can afford to do, a voluntary withdrawal from a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood. We ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong.

And, then, he further states:

> I ask this of you in support of the foreign policy of the administration. I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure.

It seems that many Members of this body and of the other House of Congress who had on the passage of the act which is now sought to be amended voted for the provisions which the President insists now are in "contravention to the treaty" and "constitute a mistaken economic policy from every point of view," like President Wilson are attempting to cover their tracks and throw the people who are following and watching them off the trail. The President in some way not known to those of us who are not in his confidence is able to command obedience and submission to his will of many of those of his party followers, and that against their expressed, avowed, and recorded opinions and judgments. We find many of them undertaking to give reasons for their change, and giving very different and peculiar reasons therefor. The President does not tell us what is the foreign policy of his administration in support of which he desires us to enact this legislation. He states that he will not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence which, from the language and the connection in which that statement is used, would probably not refer to his foreign policy, but to something else about which he furnishes us no information and is unwilling to enlighten us with reference thereto. What are the matters of "greater delicacy" than his foreign policy with which he would not know how to deal? Also, what are the "matters of nearer consequence" with which he would not know how to deal? Who can answer the question? Who has attempted to answer the question? Yet this language has been used by the President in order to influence our action on this measure. Section 3, article 2, of the Constitution of the United States, in speaking of the powers and duties of the President, says:

> He shall from time to time give to Congress information of the state of the Union and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient.

That communication in regard to the foreign policy and "other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence" does not give to Congress any information of the state of the Union. It possibly does recommend to our consideration the measure before us as one which he possibly judges to be necessary and expedient. But should not that judgment of his, under the clause of the Constitution which is stated, be accompanied with information on which we should form our judgment or act? Or is it that the President is allowed to form his own judgment as to what is necessary and expedient and tell us without giving any reason for it or without allowing us to use our judgments? Certainly the address contains no information whatever. Nor does the clause in his address which urges us to "reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong" give us any information. He asks us to take his judgment for it. It is true that in another part of the address he states that in his "judgment, very fully considered and maturely formed, that exemption constitutes a mistaken economic policy from every point of view" and is "in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain." If it was intended that Congress should blindly follow the will and recommendations of the President as to this legislation, as he in this address urges us to do, "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong," then it may be said that he has made a recommendation on a measure which he judges necessary and expedient, although he gives us no information as to the facts. Can we be expected, without raising the question, to accept that as a reason for the repeal of this law, especially when we find that the party which nominated and elected him to the office which he now holds distinctly advocated the enactment of the law in its present terms in the platform of principles which they formulated and laid before him and the country as the reasons why they should be placed in power and their candidate elected President? Must we not consider that the will of the people when expressed, after due consideration of the reasons which induced them to elect the party which is now in power to take over the administration of the affairs of this country, should have great weight with the legislators and Executive of the United States in the conduct of the public business and in the enactment of our laws? And must we not also believe that the understanding of the people when they elected the present Executive and the present Congress, and gave them the power they now have, was that the administration and the majority of Congress elected thereon should carry out those principles as construed and interpreted by the members of their convention and their candidates and representatives at the time they were asking to be intrusted with the Government? There was no apparent misunderstanding about the meaning of the language which is incorporated in the Democratic platform. The present Secretary of State, the intimate adviser of the Chief Executive, was chairman of the committee which drafted that platform. The matter of constructing and operating the Panama Canal in the interest of the people of the United States and for the general welfare of the people of the world had long been discussed and debated. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty was then in full force. The act in question had already passed the House and been extensively discussed therein, and particularly the provision under consideration, and the same had been considered in the committee of the Senate at the time the Democratic convention was held. The attention of the present Chief Executive had been called to it and called to it in a way that he sought to avail himself and his party of the benefits to be derived from his then construction thereof.

The President, as before stated, said to us in his address on this matter that we should voluntarily withdraw from "a position everywhere questioned and misunderstood." Did he mean by that that the action of Congress in exempting coastwise ships from toll was everywhere questioned, and also that it was misunderstood? He stated that that action was in contravention with the treaty with Great Britain. Does he properly mean by that that our action as to being in contravention with the treaty was everywhere questioned but that those who questioned it misunderstood it? Can his language be interpreted in any other way? He must have been reading and been impressed with the short biography of Theodore Roosevelt, written by Alfred Henry Lewis about the time of, or shortly after, the modification made in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901, in which Alfred Henry Lewis, speaking on the subject of the canal, said:

> The propriety of the canal no one American—save transcontinental railways—was ever heard to deny, but to the last crowned head of them, every European ruler, and even the elected one of France, has been and is opposed—they believe with Sir Walter Raleigh that he who holds the Isthmus of Darien holds the keys to the world, and are solicitous that no such lock opener shall hang at the girdle of America.

At the same time the President gives us to understand in that message that our action was misunderstood. How could it have been misunderstood? It was a simple, plain act, expressed in as few words as possible and as pointed as it could be made, and that was that no tolls should be charged on coastwise ships of the United States passing through the canal. That language could not be misunderstood. The purpose of it could not well be misunderstood. But, as stated by Alfred Henry Lewis, to—> the propriety of the canal * * * to the last crowned head of them, every European ruler, and even the elected one of France, has been and is opposed.

And that is what the President tells us is not debated; he says, outside of the United States, but that it is misunderstood everywhere, and therefore we should take this step recommended by him, whether we were right or wrong in passing that act, although our act in doing so is misunderstood by all other countries, they being opposed to our position. If their opposition is based upon a misunderstanding, why should we reverse it in order to carry out an improper interpretation or understanding of our acts in passing that law?

President Wilson, about August 16, 1912, delivered a very remarkable speech to 2,500 farmers of the State of New Jersey, his own home State, for the purpose of catching votes for himself in that campaign so as to be elected to the high office he now holds. He told them in that speech, in his peculiarly lucid manner, somewhat like the manner he addressed us on the 5th of March last, that—

> By a very ingenious process, which I would not keep you standing in the hot sun long enough to outline, the legislation of the United States has destroyed the merchant marine of the United States.

Then, after making some other statements to flatter their vanity and attract their consideration to himself, he said:

> One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports, to allow all the farmers on which I may, standing here, call this part of the continent to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard, and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast of South America.

And then he proceeds:

> Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate as it had passed the House—provides for free toll for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company.

And then he says:

> You see the object of that, don't you? We do not want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition.
> We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

He then, to flatter the farmers further, says:

> The farmers of this country are, in my judgment, just as much concerned in the policy of the United States with regard to that canal as any other class of citizens of the United States. Probably they are more concerned than any other one class; and what I am most desirous to see is the farmers of the country coming forward as partners in the great national undertakings and take a wide national, nay, international, view of these great matters, feeling all the pulses of the world that beat in the great arteries of their own life and prosperity. Everything that is done in the interest of cheap transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men. So that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways.

And then he calls attention to the platform and its objects and purposes by saying:

> Our platform is not molasses to catch flies. It means business. It means what it says. It is the utterance of earnest and honest men, who intend to do business along those lines and who are not waiting to see whether they can catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. They know the American people are now taking notice in a way in which they never took notice before, and gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat.

According to this last statement I think the President may have been somewhat of a prophet. He certainly has talked one way and proposed to vote another when he signs this bill, if it passes. Will he and those who have changed from advocating that measure to catch votes retire voluntarily into very quiet and private retreat? If they do not, most of them may expect the people will retire them to such retreat against their will. The President seems to have been fully assured that the platform was the utterance of earnest and honest men who intend to do business along those lines and who were not waiting to see whether they could catch votes with those promises before they determine whether they are going to act upon them or not. Surely he did not ask to get the votes before he had determined to act upon the promises. His determination must have been fully made up. He had entered upon that determination with a well-based consideration that he would carry it out and was simply presenting it to them in all of his earnestness and in all of his extreme desire to catch their votes and secure his election.

When we take these utterances, given under such circumstances as they were given there, after the principles about which he was talking had been enunciated by over a thousand chosen delegates in the Baltimore convention, selected from those who were supposed to be the best informed and most progressive men of his party, and after he had accepted them as party principles to which he had pledged his adherence, we must naturally suppose that he had them then "fully considered and maturely formed," his judgment in regard to the matters about which he was communicating with the farmers of New Jersey and on which he was soliciting their votes in his behalf.

If such utterances as he made there were made without a judgment fully considered and maturely formed, namely, if they were made from impulse, a desire, and a wish to gain votes without due consideration and reference to the soundness of the proposition advanced, then surely the last clause of that remarkable speech should be made operative as to him and his party; that is, that "gentlemen who talk one way and vote another are going to be retired to very quiet and private retreat." It would seem from the attitude of the President and his party adherents at the present time that the platform utterances of the Baltimore convention were "molasses to catch flies" and nothing else.

Such being the case, well might the President say to us that we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong. After taking the position in which he had placed himself by that speech to the farmers and by his address to us and by his acceptance of the nomination under the platform of his party containing an advocacy of the law which he now wishes repealed he could give no other reason. For us to comply, right or wrong, would be according to his way of dealing with the voters. He has been setting us an example which he expects us to follow. An example in which, it is said by many, he has coerced his political friends into cooperating with him, regardless of whether it is "right or wrong." Every Democrat in the Senate who voted on the motion of Senator BURTON to strike out that free-toll proposition voted against doing so in favor of free tolls. Twenty-two of them did so, and 20 of that number are still here.

But notwithstanding this turncoat policy of the administration or of the Executive who now constitutes the administration, many of us believe that the action taken by Congress in exempting coastwise ships through the canal from the payment of tolls and providing that as to American ships the President could fix the tolls as he pleased or exempt them entirely is "just and equitable," and that it is not in contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which the President says it contravenes.

Some of the Senators who voted to retain the provision now sought to be repealed have stated that they will now vote to repeal it because it amounts to a subsidy. Why should we not subsidize our ships in order to build up a substantial merchant marine? If we could build up a merchant marine by subsidizing it, would it not save to this country and to our people large volumes of money which are now paid to foreign subsidized ships for freight and passengers annually? Statistics show that we pay hundreds of millions each year to foreign ships to carry our freight and passengers to and from foreign countries, all of which could be kept at home if we had a merchant marine sufficient to do that carrying. Everything else being equal the patriotism of the American would make him prefer the American vessel to the foreign vessel.

At the present time nine-tenths of the passengers and freight of Americans to and from foreign countries is carried in foreign ships. If we had sufficient ships belonging to our countrymen, nine-tenths would be carried in those ships and nine-tenths of the money which is now paid to foreign shipowners by Americans would be paid to American shipowners and kept at home. The amount of money expended in transporting freight and passengers, which should and would annually go in American ships in one year, if used for the purpose of constructing American ships, would enable us to nearly absorb the ocean traffic of the world. That money if paid to the owners of American ships would be invested in the building of other American ships, which would compete for the traffic of the world. It is true that that money would not go into the United States Treasury, but it would go to our people, like all other moneys which are expended in this country. It would permeate every branch of industry. It would help to build ships and every legitimate enterprise in our land.

Many Members of this Congress who now give as a reason that they will not support this free-toll law because it is a subsidy are certainly committed by their former deliberate acts to a contrary proposition. In addition to the law proposed to be repealed, there is in the tariff law which passed this Congress at the extraordinary session an express provision that 5 per cent of the duties on all merchandise imported into the United States in an American registered ship shall be deducted from the duties imposed by that legislation. This is directly in the face of the treaty of 1815 with Great Britain, from which country the great body of our imports come.

In article 2 of that treaty it is specifically and unequivocally stated—

> That no higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by a vessel of the United States.

And also—

> The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles the growth, product, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

If the exemption of tolls in favor of our coastwise trade is a subsidy, then is not that reduction upon the amount of duties to be imposed on merchandise brought into the United States in American ships of 5 per cent also a subsidy, and a much clearer and more specific one? That reduction of duties might not only have the character of being a subsidy, but it has the additional character of being, directly, a violation of the treaty of 1815 with Great Britain. Why should the Chief Executive of this Nation and the majority party in this Congress, when they know Great Britain has protested against that reduction as violative of treaties with her, not call for its repeal without considering whether it is right or wrong?

Possibly the party of the majority in Congress have not been quickened into activity in that regard by the spiritual inspiration emanating from a threat to withdraw from them political patronage. The spirit may yet move them.

Is there anything in the treaty which prohibits any nation from reimbursing its subjects for tolls paid through the canal? It is admitted by many here and denied by few, if any, that we have the right to reimburse our ships for the tolls they pay, the same as foreign nations do. Is it not drawing a very technical distinction to say that we can not release the payment of the tolls to the shippers when we have the right to reimburse them for the tolls they pay? The only difference between the two propositions is that the payment by the coastwise ships would go into the general body of the income of the canal, while if they were released from it it would not be added to it.

But where would that make any difference, except as to the United States, when we do not collect enough tolls on the entire shipping going through the canal to pay the total expense of operation, maintenance, sanitation of the canal, interest upon the money invested, and an additional expense of $10,000,000 for the Army and Navy to protect it and keep it neutralized. The deficit in that way will amount to many times as much as the tolls which we will collect from the coastwise ships.

Earl Grey refers to the only plausible point which might be suggested against our exempting tolls to our coastwise ships in his communication to Ambassador Bryce of November 14, 1912, printed in the hearings of the Senate had in reference to this bill, in which he is supposed to have stated the whole objection of Great Britain, on page 1018 of which he says:

> This rule also provides that the tolls should be "just and equitable." The purpose of these words was to limit the tolls to the amount representing the fair value of the services rendered—i. e., to the interest on the capital expended and the cost of the operation and maintenance of the canal. Unless the whole volume of shipping which passes through the canal, and which all benefits equally by its services, is taken into account, there are no means of determining whether the tolls chargeable upon a vessel represent that vessel's fair proportion of the current expenditure properly chargeable against the canal; that is to say, interest on the capital expended in construction and the cost of operation and maintenance.
> If any classes of vessels are exempted from tolls in such a way that no receipts from such ships are taken into the account in the income of the canal, there is no guaranty that the vessels upon which tolls are being levied are not being made to bear more than their fair share of the upkeep. Apart altogether therefore, from the provision in rule 1 about equality of treatment for all nations, the stipulation that the tolls shall be just and equitable, when rightly understood, entitles His Majesty's Government to demand, on behalf of British shipping, that all nations passing through the canal, whatever their flag or their character, shall be taken into account in fixing the amount of the tolls.

The point made by him is that by the exemption of any ships from the payment of tolls, the amount which would be required to be charged as tolls on the other ships passing through the canal, in order to pay the current expenditure properly chargeable against the canal, that is, interest on the capital expended in construction and cost of operation and maintenance, would exceed their proper proportion, more than it would be if the tolls were charged upon all ships alike, regardless of their character. That might possibly, in one view of the case, be a fair criticism of the law if it was understood that the tolls should be made sufficiently high to raise the total of all the money necessary to pay the maintenance and operation of the canal and fair interest upon the money invested, and also the costs of the Army and Navy to neutralize the canal, but this law does not require that amount to be imposed. In fact, the law which embraces the clause now sought to be repealed provides that the tolls on no ship shall exceed $1.25 for each registered ton, and shall not be less than 75 cents except on American ships.

With equal propriety the British Government could also object to the limitation in the law that the amount should not be less than 75 cents per registered ton, for the reason that in the course of time the increased shipping passing through the canal may, at the rate of 75 cents per registered ton, raise a higher amount than would be necessary to pay the maintenance and operation of the canal and a reasonable interest. But whatever that rate is, it is not for the British Government or any other Government to say what interest we will impose to reimburse us on our investment or to pay for its use in the canal.

There is no place in the United States where interest to-day is probably less than 4 per cent per annum, and times may come, as it has in the past, when interest will vastly exceed 4 per cent. It may come, also, when the current rate of interest will fall lower than 4 per cent, but it is doubtful that it will ever be much lower. It is true that we have been able to obtain money for 2 and 3 per cent, but that was not because the persons furnishing the money desired it as a simple interest-earning investment. It was because they could use the bonds for which it was given in the national banks to secure the issue of national-bank currency, and thus obtain the interest upon the money invested in the bonds as well as on the bank stock, giving them much more than 4 or 5 or even 6 per cent interest upon the investment which they made. Take away from the bonds carrying that 2 and 3 per cent the right to use them as a basis for the issuance of national-bank currency and I challenge anyone to show where those bonds will be maintained at par or can be maintained at par. To-day they are below par.

The argument of Earl Grey falls to the ground, because at the lowest rate of interest suggested, which is 3 per cent, the amount which will be raised by the tolls at $1.20 per registered ton will fall far short of the required quantity to pay the entire maintenance and operation of the canal and that interest, not taking into account the cost of the Army and Navy in protecting the canal. The only other question suggested in the argument of Earl Grey on this point is that we would not know how much would be lost by allowing our coastwise shipping to go through the canal free. That is a matter of regulation in the canal. There is no reason why we should not know it. There is no reason why every vessel that passes through the canal should not be inspected and its tonnage ascertained. It would be a mere matter of regulation to require every vessel to be measured and its tonnage ascertained according to the same rules adopted for all foreign vessels and reported to the proper authorities who have to collect the tolls upon other vessels.

It would require no law to do that; we can always know what the exact amount would be that was exempted in favor of such vessels, and whenever that amount reached the point where it would be more than the deficit which our Government would have to make up out of the Public Treasury to pay for the operation and maintenance of the canal and interest and other charges it would then be time enough, if ever, to raise the questions in favor of Great Britain which are now being raised here. It would then be the time when, if she was entitled to it, she could demand an arbitration. But how can Great Britain demand an arbitration until she knows that a discrimination is being made which affects the interests of her shippers or shipowners? How can she demand an arbitration, if at all, until she knows what rate of interest we propose to charge upon the money which we have invested in that canal, as well as all other expenses incidental to its operation and maintenance?

The fact that we have provided for the issuance of bonds to raise money to construct the canal, bearing interest at the rate of 3 per cent, is no reason why that would be an adequate interest to pay the Government for the money invested in that canal. That money was raised at par by our Government simply on account of the condition of banking affairs in the United States.

It may be possible that the management of the banking interest will be radically changed. It is generally asserted by the party in power throughout the land that they have no love for the present national banking system, and they do not believe, as a rule, that bonds should be used to secure the national-bank currency. It was proposed at the commencement of the enactment of the bill to establish regional banks that all bonds should be retired. In that way there would be none of them left upon which to base the issuance of national-bank currency.

If such course should prevail—and who will say that it may not prevail if the party in power continues in power—would it be pretended that this Government could raise money on the issuance of a bond bearing 3 per cent interest, to be held as an ordinary investment, without the right to use it in the manner in which it is now being used, or some equivalent manner? It is difficult to believe that anyone would think so. When we calculate the amounts to be reimbursed to us, we must calculate money at current rates, at the rate it bears, not in the markets of Europe, but in the markets of the United States. The withdrawal of the bonds so that they can not be used for the issuance of national-bank currency, or something equivalent to that, would reduce them below par. Can it be said in estimating the tolls to be imposed to make up these expenses or outlay in the shape of operation and maintenance and interest, as well as other expenses which may be necessary, that we would not have the right to demand interest, even as high as 4, 5, or even 6 per cent if the condition of affairs in this country should require it? And are we not traveling rapidly now in that direction?

By the statements which were incorporated into the RECORD by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] a few days since, it appears that the financial policy adopted by the present administration has had the effect to reduce our exports to foreign countries to such an extent, and to increase the imports from foreign countries to such an extent, that the balance of trade during the month of April last was against us, while during the fiscal year last past that balance of trade was about $650,000,000 in our favor. That was $650,000,000 added to the real wealth of our country over and above what will be added to it if conditions continue in the same channel they are now going. How much that balance of trade will hereafter be against us we do not know.

It was about $10,271,872 for the month of April, so that instead of our receiving an addition to our wealth of $650,000,000 annually, we will be paying out and deducting from our wealth about $123,000,000 annually, provided that it does not grow any worse than it was in the month of April; but the facts exhibited show that there is a decided gradual increase in this change of the balance of trade against us, so that we may expect a still greater balance of trade as time goes on under the present laws enacted under the forced conditions imposed by the present administration. If money grows scarce, the rates of interest will increase, and, according to said statistics, money may soon be scarce.

Is the exemption of our coastwise shipping from tolls through the canal a violation of the first clause of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? Does that provision, fairly and legally construed, so hold? It provides:

> The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

It will be noted that the last clause of that section defines what conditions and charges of traffic shall be. What was the necessity of inserting those words "such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable" if the ships as to tolls should go through upon an entire equality? Possibly, one answer to that might be that the charges should not be excessively great so as to impose unreasonable burdens upon those who pay the tolls. That is possibly one thing that was meant; but the language is not limited to that alone. The words "just and equitable" must be considered in connection with all the circumstances and surroundings in connection with the facts that the United States and its people built that canal and own it and must operate and will be responsible for its neutralization and perpetuity as a channel of traffic; that they must repair it should earthquakes or landslides or other extraordinary events happen which might obstruct it; that to defend it they must keep an army and navy there, and even engage in war and go to extraordinary expense to see that it is protected against interruption or seizure or obstruction in any manner by foreign nations.

The words "just and equitable" contained in the last paragraph of clause 1 of article 3 of the existing treaty were not incorporated in the treaty first agreed upon and ratified by the Senate of the United States with an amendment and which was rejected by Great Britain.

The present treaty made radical changes in the provisions of article 3, being article 2 of the treaty which was not accepted by Great Britain. That proposed treaty contained a paragraph, at the end of clause 5, article 2, which was inserted as an amendment by the Senate of the United States, as follows:

> It is agreed, however, that none of the immediately foregoing conditions and stipulations in sections Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5 of this article shall apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order.

Evidently, Great Britain did not wish to give its assent to the provisions of that amendment that she was to be a party to the enforcement of the treaty clauses mentioned in the article 2 of that proposed treaty.

By that article she would have bound herself, jointly with the United States, to the enforcement of all the clauses of the same; whereas in the new treaty, the one now in force, it was provided that the United States alone, and not in conjunction with Great Britain, adopted the rules for the neutralization of the canal; and at the end of clause 1 of article 3 thereof there was inserted the provision "that the conditions and charges of traffic should be just and equitable." Those words were not incorporated in the treaty which was rejected by Great Britain. They must have been inserted by the United States, because the neutralization of the canal was confided entirely to her, and the matter of charges was left entirely to her, she being the sole owner and constructor of the canal and having the entire superintendence and government of it. The purpose of inserting that provision was to be a modification and limitation of the provisions preceding; that is, the terms "entire equality" and "no discrimination against nations."

Would not the words "just and equitable" be considered when the United States should fix the amount of charges which it would impose for the purpose of paying the operation, maintenance, and sanitation of the canal, proper interest on the money invested, including the cost of the Army and Navy in fortifying and protecting it, and even for a sinking fund to pay for the entire amount? Where is the limit imposed upon the United States by those words? We have to decide what is "just and equitable." In article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty it was provided that the canal might be constructed under the auspices of the United States and that, subject to the treaty, this Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal. That confers upon our Government the entire, absolute, and perfect dominion over that canal.

We have the right under those provisions to regulate the tolls, as we have undertaken to do; and in regulating those tolls we are only required to make them so that they are "just and equitable" according to the circumstances and conditions connected with the canal, of which we ourselves are the sole judges.

Has the time arrived when this question can be properly agitated as to whether we are discriminating or not? Dr. Emery Johnson estimates that the total receipts from tolls, including tolls from coastwise ships, if imposed, would reach about $12,600,000. It is estimated by Col. Goethals that the annual charges for the operation and maintenance of the canal, its sanitation, and the annuity to Panama will amount to over $4,250,000. We have invested, or will have invested, in this canal about $400,000,000 when it shall have been completed, including the cost of fortifying it, the interest upon which, at 3 per cent, will amount to $12,000,000 per annum, which should be paid to us out of incomes, commencing from the time we made the expenditures, or, otherwise, adding the interest in the meantime until the canal is thoroughly opened, to arrive at the sum to constitute the full amount on which the interest shall be computed. This, added to the cost of operation, maintenance, sanitation of the canal, and the annuity to Panama, will not be less than $16,250,000 annually, and may be considerably more, to which must be added $10,000,000 annually for the Army and Navy expenses in protecting and fortifying the canal. So that there will be a deficit, even if the tolls on coastwise ships are imposed, of over $3,800,000 annually, without taking into consideration the Army and Navy expenses, which will have to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and this amount will be increased by $4,000,000 if we estimate the rate of interest at 4 per cent, which would be entirely reasonable.

Until the stage is reached in which the tolls shall exceed the amount of operation, maintenance, and sanitation of the canal, annuity to Panama, and a fair interest to be allowed upon the amount invested, besides the Army and Navy expenses in protecting it, what country will have the right to complain that we are discriminating against them? The amount of tolls which will be charged for American coastwise ships estimated by Prof. Johnson will be about $1,200,000 annually, which will, if deducted, reduce the annual income from the canal to about $11,400,000.

But it is said they must be so regulated that there will be no discrimination, and the question arises here, What is a discrimination? And in determining that it will only be necessary to consider whether or not the passage of our coastwise ships through the canal without paying toll constitutes a discrimination. Under our laws coastwise ships can not receive or discharge freight or passengers at any port outside of the United States. They may land at foreign ports for the purpose of repairs or to revictual. When one of them undertakes to go into a foreign port to deliver or receive freight or passengers it is compelled to surrender its license as a coastwise ship under the law. A coastwise ship of a foreign country—and all of them have coastwise ships regulated very much as ours are—can not receive freight at a port in the United States to be discharged at another port in the United States. Our coastwise ships are limited to business along our coast.

All ships of foreign nations, as well as our own, doing business between our ports and foreign ports, in doing business along the coasts of the United States, can only deliver their freight and passengers brought from a foreign port to our country, although they may for that purpose enter different harbors or ports, but they can not take on freight from one port to another; for instance, from New York to Baltimore or Charleston or New Orleans. While they may go from New York to New Orleans to deliver the freight which they have brought across the seas, not one pound can they take up on our coast and carry and deliver to another port on our coast.

Our coastwise ships and all our ships are excluded from doing a coastwise business in foreign countries. All foreign ships are excluded from doing a coastwise business in our country, as well as all of our own ships which are not registered or licensed as coastwise ships. So that the business in which the coastwise ships of Great Britain are engaged, while of a similar character or kind as that in which our coastwise ships are engaged, is absolutely a distinct and different business, not in conflict with or by our coastwise ships. There can be no competition in the most remote degree between the coastwise ships of England and those of America. Neither can do any part of the business which the other can do. Then why say there is a discrimination against the foreign shipping by granting to our coastwise ships free tolls through the canal? We do not take away one penny which can or might be gained by the British shipping. We do not diminish their income in anything.

If we do not do injury or wrong or diminish the earnings of their shipping, or take away their traffic, how can it be said that any law of ours discriminates against them? To do so you would have to go still further and say that by virtue of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in order that British ships should be put upon an equality with ours, we should repeal our coastwise ship law and admit Great Britain to do business along our coast with our own ships. But no one will contend for that proposition; if they should, they would certainly be judged to be very un-American and unpatriotic. It is claimed by some that we discriminate against the ships of foreign countries which may bring freight, say, from Liverpool to New York and discharge it there and reship it upon an American coastwise ship to San Francisco, and that therefore we would enable that kind of shipping to discriminate against foreign shipping. But such would in no manner be the result.

It is shown that by reshipping at the port of New York, for instance, it would cost at least 25 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds to unload, and to reload it in the same port another amount of at least 25 cents, which, besides breakage, delay, increase of the distance, and other injury, would more than exceed the $1.20 per registered ton, which is not more than 60 cents per ton of 2,000 pounds, which we have imposed upon the foreign shipping and our own transoceanic ships through the canal. This treaty should be interpreted in accordance with its practical results and not upon theoretical ideas which will never be realized. The discrimination which is prohibited by the treaty must be one that so discriminates between the shipping of our own country and that of others that there will be a loss or injury to the other shipping. In all the arguments which I have noticed in this Chamber and read in the RECORD, I have not yet seen one that points out any substantial injury or loss that will result to foreign ships passing through the canal by exempting our coastwise ships, or any of our ships from paying tolls, until the amount collected shall exceed the sum required for operation, maintenance, sanitation of the canal, the annuity to Panama, interest on the investment, and the Army and Navy expenses to be incurred in defending and protecting the canal.

It is insisted by some and denied by others that our vessels of war, both transports and battleships, should pay tolls in going through the canal. If the reasons mentioned by Earl Grey, that our coastwise ships ought to be charged in order to not oblige foreign shipping to pay a higher rate of toll than would be necessary to pay the operation, maintenance, sanitation of the canal, and interest upon the money invested, should be maintained—and that is all the British Government actually claims—why do not the same reasons prevail as to our vessels of war, including transports and battleships? Why should not the amount be paid by the Nation in order to reduce the proportionate amount that British shipping and the shipping of other foreign nations should pay, so that it can be known and easily ascertained how much it would be just and equitable for foreign nations to pay?

Can there be any distinction drawn between the United States being obliged to pay tolls in order to make up the total amount that is necessary to pay the expenses of operating and maintaining the canal and providing for the interest on the money and payment of other charges and that of requiring our coastwise shipping, or any other American shipping of commerce or war, to pay tolls for that purpose? It is generally admitted that we have the right to pay back or reimburse all our ships for what they have paid out; but it is insisted that we ought to pay it in the first instance, whether reimbursed or not, so as to determine the proportion of the cost of operation, maintenance, sanitation of the canal, and of the proper amount of interest we should bear on our part. Such might be true if the amount when paid by shippers would more than cover the total cost of operation, maintenance, sanitation of the canal, the annuity to Panama, and the costs of the Army and Navy in protecting and fortifying it, but otherwise not.

How can we draw a distinction between our coastwise ships and our vessels of war in paying toll in the face of the treaty which uses both of them in the same connection and without any discrimination or difference between the words applying to them? Yet it is admitted by nearly every one, if not by every one, that our warships should not be charged with tolls, but where the authority comes to do that it is difficult to ascertain from the language of the clause in question if the United States are included in the words "all nations." If the language which provides for the neutralization of the canal applies to the ships of commerce and war of foreign nations and to our own coastwise ships through the canal, then it applies to our ships of war as well. There are no words of exception in favor of our ships of war. I do not believe that the neutralization which is referred to in the treaty applies to the ships of the United States and its citizens. If it did, our warships must be treated in the payment of tolls exactly as our merchant ships, or as the merchant ships of any other nation, or the warships of any other nation.

I believe that the neutralization which is referred to is that which is specified in the second, third, fourth, fifth, and sixth clauses of article 3 of that treaty, and that means that we shall keep that canal from being blockaded, from any act of war being exercised or hostility committed therein, but that can not apply to the United States, nor can the clause which provides that vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual or take any stores in the canal except strictly necessary, and that they shall pass through with the least possible delay, in accordance with the regulations in force, which we are to prescribe. Nor the provision that no belligerent shall embark or disembark troops or munitions of war or warlike materials on the canal except in case of accidental hindrance, and so forth. Nor the provision that the vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain longer than 24 hours in the waters, and so forth. Nor that the vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours of the vessel of war of another belligerent, or that any of the provisions or clauses of article 3 of the treaty, namely, Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, are intended to operate upon the vessels of war of the United States as they do upon the vessels of war of other countries.

If clause 1 is to be construed as a part of the neutralization of the canal, and the other clauses are to be considered according to their actual literal reading, without reference to the circumstances and conditions prevailing and without reference to the fact that we are the owners of the canal, that we built it and are managing and controlling it for the benefit of commerce; then if we were at war with Great Britain or any other country and such country at war with us should seek to seize the canal or to blockade it, we would have no right to disembark an additional force in the canal for its protection, nor to keep our ships within it to prevent it from being seized. We would have to act as any other foreign countries being at war. Our soldiers would have to stay away from the canal. Our ships would have to leave it and get more than 3 miles away from the mouth or entrance to it. We would have to leave it open to our enemies for assault. One of these enemies might be some nation which would be in the category of not even having observed the rules which we had prescribed for the government of the canal. We would not be allowed under that provision, with our ships in the canal, to engage in a battle with the ships of a foreign nation who had sailed into the canal and attacked us.

It is true we might use our forces which we then had there and our guns which we had already established there for the defense of the canal to drive them off, or to prevent their occupying the canal; but if they entered into the canal and got into the big lake through which it passes, where they might find vessels of our fleet, we would not have the right to engage in a conflict with them, if the construction which some place upon this treaty holds good. But will anyone upon a fair consideration of the conditions and circumstances and surroundings of the requirements of that clause and the relation of the facts thereto contend that we would not have a right to keep our fleet there; that we would not have a right to land additional troops there; that we would not have a right to do everything which is prohibited by those different sections of the treaty in order to safeguard and protect that canal for neutral nations and for future use? It may be that it is not very probable that such condition would exist, but it may. We may get into a war with foreign nations who would like to own that canal. Treaties are seldom ever kept in perpetuity. They are sometimes abrogated by agreement. Frequently they are ignored. Often they become obsolete and sometimes broken or violated. Now and then a treaty continues, as has the treaty with Great Britain which acknowledged our independence and which will continue as long as we are an independent Nation.

If Great Britain or Germany should not observe the rules prescribed in article 3 of the treaty, but should get control of the canal and hold it against all others, who would be required to enforce the terms of the treaty? On whom would the obligation to keep the canal free and neutral devolve? It will be noticed the United States was the only power which adopted the neutralization clause of the canal.

This was changed from the provisions of article 2 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which was ratified by the United States, but rejected by Great Britain, in which both countries provided for the joint neutralization of the canal. Why was this change made? Certainly it was so made after reconsideration of the provisions of the former treaty, and, possibly, after suggestions which had been made by Great Britain in her objections which were to the amendment which was inserted—clause 5, article 2—in that treaty in regard to using force for the defense of the United States and maintenance of public order in the canal, which it is supposed was the substantial objection that Great Britain made to the ratification of that treaty. It was understood, evidently, that that provision should be rejected and the United States should have the sole power of neutralizing the canal, which meant that they alone should use the necessary force required to keep it neutral.

But if the construction which is said to be placed upon that treaty with reference to the coastwise shipping of the United States must prevail, we have placed ourselves in the attitude of compelling our ships of war to be subject to the same conditions as the ships of war of other nations. We are compelling ourselves to abide by the provisions which, while we are defending the canal against a foreign power, will not allow us to occupy it or deal with it so as to protect it for the use of the world.

I make this contention to call the attention of the Senators to the fact that we are not to be treated in connection with that canal in the same light as other foreign nations; that the rules which we established there were to operate differently upon us from what they should operate upon other nations; that when we prescribed rules as we had a right to prescribe and regulations as we had a right to adopt we did it for foreign nations, with the idea that we might observe them or not, as we liked. That we were not bound by the same restrictions in the treaty with which other nations were bound; that we were dealing with our own property and with our own rights and protecting them against the claims and acts of all nations as far as we deemed it just and equitable to do so.

In construing the words "just and equitable" in the treaty, as I have stated, we must construe them in the light of all the facts and surrounding circumstances; in the light of the ownership or nonownership of the canal; in the light of the obligations or the want of obligations of different nations and ours in regard to the canal and the difference between such obligations; in the light of everything which goes to the construction, maintenance, operation, and government of the canal, and not by a strict construction of the letter of the treaty, which would work absurdity in many instances if such construction was to be made to apply to us. If they do not apply to us with the same obligations and restraints that they do to other countries in article 3 thereof, then every provision of it must be modified or limited when it is intended to apply it to us for our guidance and observation, in accordance with the relation we bear to the canal, different from that which any other country bears. Great Britain had no rights at the Isthmus of Panama when that treaty was entered into. She gave away no rights that she had at that place—ceded nothing. She had agreed that we might construct a Nicaraguan canal or some other canal at some other point where she might have had some rights. She can not interpose herself in this manner and say that we are depriving her of some right which we owe to her on account of some concession made by herself at that isthmus, where she had nothing to concede.

I insist that the rules of neutrality prescribed by the treaty only embrace paragraphs 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, which are to be enforced by the United States, to do which we can not comply with them as a foreign power. There is a difference between money paid by a foreigner for tolls and that paid by a citizen of the United States. So far as we are concerned, the foreigner's money goes into the Treasury of the United States when paid and stays paid. We do not refund it to him. A citizen's money will go into the Treasury of the United States, but we may refund it to him as a matter of public policy. What is the difference between exempting the tolls of an individual and refunding them to him after they are paid? Why can not we exempt the party from paying tolls to the same extent as if we repaid them? It is said that the citizens of the United States are not the United States. But the citizens of the United States are not citizens of foreign countries, nor do they occupy the same relation to the United States as citizens of foreign countries. They are entitled to help, protection, and the benefit of legislation.

Our citizens pay for this canal. It has been contended by some that they do not favor the exemption of tolls because that would require the United States to tax the people to pay the amount which is exempted, and also because it would be encouraging a monopoly in the shipping business; that the tax would be compelled to be paid by the poor people who are not prepared to stand it. This contention is contradictory in its terms. It is contended that it would protect a monopoly which should not be protected; also, that it would impose a duty upon the rich, including all monopolies, who they say ought not to be protected. The poor people would not be taxed to make up any deficit which would be caused by exempting the tolls. The tax for that purpose would be raised exactly the same as our revenue is raised to-day.

First, from the incomes of persons having more than $3.000 and from corporations having an income. Certainly there ought to be no complaint on the part of the party in power to increasing the tax very slightly on that class of our people. The next source of revenue from which we obtain taxes is from the sale and manufacture of liquor and tobacco, both of which are counted as luxuries and not entitled to any tender consideration. Certainly they are not entitled to any more consideration than the upbuilding of our shipping. The third source from which we obtain tax is from merchandise imported from foreign countries, nearly all of which imports are never used by or reach people who have an income less than $3.000. The poor people of this country do not purchase foreign-made goods. It is the wealthier class who do that. A great many of the articles imported consists of wines and liquors, silks and satins, and articles of luxury. Very few imported articles reach the poor.

Is there any particular reason why an additional tax may not be imposed upon the wealthy who use the articles imported? It is estimated by Prof. Johnson that the amount of the exemption from taxation would be about $1,200,000, and that is only about one-tenth part of the total amount of the estimated income of the canal. The merchandise which would go through the canal on coastwise ships would nearly all be American products. By reducing the freight we would reduce the price of the same, and as the poorer class use the American products almost entirely they would get the benefit of the free tolls. It has been shown in the arguments and by documents introduced that comparatively small portions of the coastwise ships in this country belong to corporations.

But why should not corporations be encouraged to unite their means and build ships of commerce so as to do our freighting and save the great amount that is expended from going into foreign coffers, from which we never receive any benefit? If an individual accumulates wealth in this country, he most always uses it in this country. He does not let it lie idle. He invests it. He may enter into combinations with various other parties having the capacity to carry on large enterprises, and that is necessary. If such had not been permitted, we would have no railroads in the United States; we would have no rolling mills; we would have no cotton nor woolen factories; we would have a very restricted condition of business enterprise. It would be low in its scale, insignificant in its quantity, and not of a character that reaches out, takes hold of, and develops the country or builds up great establishments in which the people can be employed and from which we can supply the wants of the country without going abroad to do it. It would be better if we could encourage capitalists to build more ships and keep the money at home.

If we could make the coastwise trade profitable to them being engaged in that character of business, they would reach out and across the ocean and carry to and from other countries the exports and imports which we now pay foreign shipowners to carry for us. Free tolls is but a small item. It is an item which we would pay. It should not be granted to any foreign shipowner or freighter, especially until the income becomes so great that it exceeds the amount of the operation and maintenance of the canal, sanitation, cost of the Army and Navy in protecting and fortifying it, a proper payment of interest, and a sinking fund be provided for.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I shall not attempt much more than a brief statement of the reasons for the faith within me that prompts support of the bill for the repeal of that provision of our law which provides toll exemption for our coastwise shipping through the Panama Canal. I am strong in that faith and strong in my convictions in behalf thereof. I had intended to prepare and deliver in this body a more extended address in behalf of repeal, but circumstances over which I had no control have prevented; and, furthermore, at this late day, after such prolonged, profound, and illuminating debate as we have had in this body, upon every phase of the subject in question, presenting every argument, pro and con, it would be inappropriate and presumptuous for me now to attempt any extended argument on the subject. I do not feel that anything that I could say would further illumine the subject or add anything to the very able and learned arguments that have preceded. However, I deem it appropriate and opportune at this time that I give to this body, and to such of my constituents as may feel an interest therein, a simple statement of my reasons for the vote I shall cast in favor of repeal and my views thereof. In doing so I realize that this is a question of large proportions, and I respect the sincerity and honesty of those who hold opposite views, granting to them the same honesty of conviction that I claim for myself.

On the 7th of August, 1912, when the act for the government of the Panama Canal was under consideration in this body and when a vote was had upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] to subject our coastwise shipping to payment of tolls, I did not vote upon that amendment, being paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN]. I do not know, had I voted thereon, how I would have voted, but presume I would probably have voted with my Democratic brethren against the amendment.

On the 9th of August, 1912, after that amendment had been defeated and when the bill for the general regulation of the canal, including the provision for toll exemption for American coastwise ships, was put upon its passage in this body, I voted for the general act in its entirety, including, as it did, the provision for toll exemption for American coastwise ships. To that extent and that extent only I voted for such toll exemption. Almost up to the time of the roll call I was undecided about how I should vote, because at that time I regarded with disfavor the idea of granting toll exemption to American coastwise ships. It impressed me then as a species of special privilege. According to my recollection, the question of whether or not such toll exemption was a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty had not been very extensively debated at that time. I was in doubt about how I should vote, and was inclined to vote against the entire act until a fellow Democratic Senator, who was sitting next to me, drew on me the Democratic national platform and called my attention to the declaration therein in favor of toll exemption for American coastwise ships. If I had known before that there was such a plank in the Democratic national platform, it had escaped me. That shows how much of an impression it had made upon me, and I doubt not there were millions of other voters upon whom it had made no more impression. I certainly did not hear it read in the convention, although present when the platform was read, and if I afterwards read that particular plank it had for the time escaped my memory. Being in doubt on the subject and not having time for extended reflection, I decided to resolve the doubt in favor of the platform and voted for the bill containing the provision for toll exemption. However, I have been sorry of it ever since. Soon thereafter, upon reflection and deliberation, I concluded that I had done wrong in voting for the bill with that provision in it, and that toll exemption for American coastwise ships was, as I now believe it is, an indefensible subsidy and a special privilege to a favored few at the expense of the many and contrary to Democratic doctrine. Long ago, before the President's message in behalf of repeal, in fact, when I first heard it rumored that Representative ADAMSON or some one else would introduce in the House a bill for the repeal of the toll-exemption provision, I determined that if I should ever have a chance to vote to reverse my former vote I would do so.

As to the contention that the exemption from tolls of American coastwise ships is a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, while I have not had the privilege of hearing, I have had the pleasure of reading a number of the very able arguments, in each the House and the Senate, for or against repeal, and I have tried to follow closely the reasoning of each; and I must say that the reasons and arguments advanced in behalf of the contention that it is a violation of that treaty are the more persuasive to me.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 between the United States and Great Britain, which was the beginning of our negotiations with Great Britain for the construction of an interoceanic canal, set forth in plain terms that any such canal constructed should be for the "benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all," thus putting the idea of the construction of such canal on a high plane of lofty principle, for the benefit of the world, utterly unselfish and free from narrowmindedness. It further provided for the strict and complete neutralization of any such canal. That treaty was superseded by the present Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The preamble of the latter refers to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and recites that the general principle of neutralization of the last-named treaty should not be impaired by the present treaty, thus continuing in force the general principle of neutralization of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and making it a part of the spirit of the present treaty. The present treaty then provides, among other things, that the present canal "shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there will be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise."

It seems to me that the words "all nations" include the United States. The treaty does not say "all nations other than the United States." How easy it would have been to have said so had it been so intended! I take it that the words mean all nations of the earth. They certainly can not mean all nations of Europe; all nations of the Eastern Hemisphere; all nations other than the United States. I think they mean all nations of the earth, and the United States is one of the nations of the earth. Learned arguments have been indulged in about the meaning of these words, but I prefer the construction of that great journal, the New York World, which, some weeks ago, said in effect that the words "all nations" need no construction, but speak for themselves and mean literally what they say. I am like the judge who said that the learned arguments of counsel might be all right, but he would decide the case on common sense. It seems to me that common sense indicates that the words "all nations" mean what they say. I am not disposed to give any technical or restricted meaning to them.

Able arguments have been made by learned statesmen to show that the provisions above quoted from section 1 of article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty do not forbid toll exemption to American coastwise ships. It has been argued that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did not contemplate the construction of the canal in its present location, that it is located on different territory from what was then contemplated, that we own the territory on which it is constructed, and may do as we please with it, and that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is thereby abrogated. Yet article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty says:

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

That alone might not put beyond doubt the control of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty over the canal, but in 1903, before the construction of the canal was begun, the United States entered into a treaty with the Republic of Panama regarding the construction, operation, and control of the canal, and article 18 of that treaty says:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901—

Meaning the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; and section 1 of article 3 thereof is the portion thereof heretofore quoted and providing for equality of treatment of all nations and providing that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Thus the United States, before beginning the construction of the canal, solemnly pledged its word to the Republic of Panama, from which it obtained the ground on which to construct the canal, that it would be constructed, operated, and conducted in strict conformity with the provisions of our Hay-Pauncefote treaty with Great Britain, thus impressing indelibly upon the canal all provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, no matter if the canal is constructed in a different place from that once anticipated. Furthermore, our treaty with the Republic of Panama expressly recites that title to the canal strip is vested in the United States, for the purpose of constructing and operating thereon a canal in accordance with the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Thus we hold the strip as trustee for an especial purpose, and should be careful of our trust.

It has been argued ably and with much force that the words "vessels of commerce" have a technical meaning and do not include coastwise ships. Yet our treaty with Great Britain in regard to the Welland Canal uses those words, and they have been held in practice by both nations to include coastwise ships. If they mean coastwise ships for the Welland Canal they mean coastwise ships for the Panama Canal. We have a large number of treaties in regard to shipping with South American republics, and in nearly every instance there is a clause that the provisions of the treaty shall not apply to coastwise ships, showing the intention specifically to exempt them. No such exemption was made nor intention manifested in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I do not care to construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in a technical way, nor to give technical meanings to its words. I prefer to construe it in a larger and more liberal way, which will be generous to the rights and contentions of others interested.

It has been contended that if we must charge our coastwise ships for passage we must charge our war vessels, but to my mind that contention is not reasonable. Our coastwise ships are owned by individuals or corporations—are privately owned—while our warships are owned by the Government, and there would be no sense in the Government taking money out of its Treasury and paying the same money back into its Treasury as toll for its warships. The law never requires a vain or useless thing to be done.

It has been contended that if we must charge our coastwise ships for passage we have no right to defend the canal in time of war, to victual our ships in it, to embark or disembark troops in it, to load on our warships within its zone munitions of war, or to do in time of war other things forbidden in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. To my mind that contention is not sound. The right of self-defense is an inherent right. Those provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty refer only to belligerent vessels of war. The United States can not be belligerent to itself. War between any two nations abrogates all treaties of, or as to, those nations. War between the United States and Great Britain would abrogate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty between those two nations. War between the United States and any other nation would abrogate the rights of that nation in or to the use of the canal under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty specifically provides that—the United States shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

I am profoundly impressed with the learned argument and sound reasoning of Prof. Emory R. Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania, as evinced in a contribution by him to the April, 1914, number of the North American Review, in which he contends, and I think clearly proves, that coastwise-toll exemption is trade discrimination, evasion of the law, and violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. To my mind his reasoning is invincible and his logic irresistible. He shows that a cargo loaded in Liverpool but intended for San Francisco and shipped in a trans-Atlantic steamer from Liverpool to New York, and there reloaded on an American coastwise ship and carried on to San Francisco via Panama Canal, would under the present condition of the law evade payment of canal tolls, while a like cargo, shipped from Liverpool direct to San Francisco via Panama Canal, would be required to pay toll.

He further shows that goods shipped from New York directly to the Orient via Panama Canal would have to pay canal tolls, while an American coastwise ship could load a cargo at New York and proceed via Panama Canal to San Francisco, and there have the goods reloaded on an oriental steamship and carried to the Orient, or that the coastwise ship, after arriving at San Francisco, could take out clearance for the Orient without unloading at San Francisco and proceed to the Orient without changing the cargo from one ship to another, and in either of the latter events payment of canal tolls would be evaded. I see nothing incorrect in his statements, nothing false in his premises. If his premises are correct, his conclusions are unavoidable and, in my opinion, can not be refuted. Prof. Johnson argues that the present law to exempt from toll American coastwise vessels when the canal may be put in operation would cause fraud, deceit, subterfuge, evasion of law, violation of the principles of our treaty, violence to integrity, and downright dishonesty. I firmly believe that he is correct.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. MYERS. With great pleasure.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I observe that the Senator is quoting from Prof. Johnson in regard to the tolls; and he spoke of transshipment at San Francisco, and said it would be an evasion of the coastwise trade provision, so that, in fact, foreign commerce would go through free. Did the Senator read the hearings of the committee, and does he remember that all of the testimony from practical, experienced men was that the cost of transshipment at San Francisco, and the delay involved, would exceed the tolls on such cargoes?

Mr. MYERS. No, Mr. President; I did not read all of the testimony before the Senate committee, nor all of that before the House committee. I read most of Prof. Johnson's testimony or statement and that of some others. I now refer to Prof. Johnson's article in the North American Review. I must say that I have not read the phase of the testimony to which the Senator from Kansas refers.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will examine the hearings, he will find that all of those who appeared before the committee who had experience in shipping and were familiar with the subject from the practical point of view said that it would be impossible to transship in that way without incurring a greater expense than the tolls would amount to.

Mr. MYERS. I gladly take the Senator's statement for that. While the gentlemen who testified to that effect doubtless have had practical experience, which Prof. Johnson has not had, Prof. Johnson is, I believe, professor of the chair of transportation and railroads in the University of Pennsylvania, and has made an exhaustive and lifelong study of the subject, and I think his opinion is entitled to great weight. Of course, I realize that these differences are largely matters of opinion as yet, because they have not been put into practice.

Mr. BRISTOW. I am sorry to impose on the Senator; but if the Senator will examine the matter carefully he will find that Prof. Johnson has expressed opinions on both sides. His books are different from his testimony; so that really, on many of these controverted points, his declarations in his books that were printed a couple of years ago or more and his testimony this year are at variance.

Mr. MYERS. That may be, Mr. President. I take it that Prof. Johnson, in that event, is not the only honest man who has ever changed his mind. I quote from his latest utterance in the North American Review for April, 1914; and I take it that his latest utterance is the one by which he would stand.

I have read with enjoyment quite a number of the learned and able arguments for or against repeal by Members of the House and Members of the Senate. All were illuminating, interesting, and persuasive, and I derived profit as well as pleasure from the reading of all thereof; but, without disparagement to any, I believe that as able, exhaustive, and convincing an argument as I have read in favor of repeal is that made by Hon. FREDERICK C. STEVENS, a Republican Representative from Minnesota. I think his arguments that toll exemption for American coastwise vessels is a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty are convincing and conclusive. Certainly he has no political motive in defending the policies of a Democratic administration or in upholding the hands of a Democratic President. He argues from an independent standpoint, without bias or prejudice, as an American citizen and patriot who has at heart the welfare and honor of his country.

I make no pretensions to being an international lawyer, jurist, or scholar, nor to having any ability along those lines. When eminent, able, and learned international lawyers, jurists, students, and scholars differ upon a great international question, as they do in this case, upon the question of whether or not toll exemption for American coastwise vessels is a violation of the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, I set up no ultimatum of my own. I merely say that the arguments of those who contend that it is a violation of the treaty are the more persuasive and convincing to me. However, I believe that upon a question like this, when eminent, able, and conscientious authorities in the persons of distinguished international lawyers, jurists, scholars, and students of our own country differ amongst themselves as to whether or not toll exemption for American coastwise vessels is violative of our treaty with another nation, we should put our national honor above dispute amongst ourselves and resolve any substantial doubt in favor of the larger and more generous construction. The only thing to do is the larger thing; especially, when the President of the United States, himself an able, wise, patriotic, learned man and profound scholar, says that in his opinion toll exemption for American coastwise ships "is in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain, concerning the canal, concluded on November 18, 1901"—the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Even though toll exemption of American coastwise ships may or may not be violative of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, be that as it may, I am unalterably opposed to toll exemption for American coastwise ships because I believe it to be an indefensible subsidy, a special privilege to the favored few at the expense of the many, a special privilege to a certain class at the expense of the masses and utterly at variance with the old-time, fundamental Democratic doctrine of equal rights for all and special privileges to none. A subsidy has been defined as "a grant of funds or property from a government to a private person or company to assist in the establishment or support of an enterprise deemed advantageous to the public; any gift of money or property made by one person to another by way of financial aid." President Taft, in one of his messages to Congress about the canal, said that toll exemption for our coastwise ships simply amounted to a subsidy to our coastwise ships and defended it as such. During the debates upon the present bill for repeal a number of Representatives and Senators who have argued against repeal have admitted that toll exemption is a subsidy and treated it as such. It is generally so accepted. I so regard it.

If the United States should donate out of the Public Treasury to the owner of each American coastwise ship a certain sum of money, it would plainly be a subsidy; and who is there who would justify or defend it? What a hue and cry of disapprobation it would raise in this country! The idea of taking by law money out of the pockets of the masses of the people and paying it over perforce to the rich owners of a few coastwise ships would be staggering; yet what is the difference between that and toll exemption? By the present law we are simply exempting from taxation, common to others, a certain class of people—relieving them from taxation at the expense of the people. I can see no practical difference between a subsidy and a discriminatory exemption from taxation; to my mind, it is the same thing in effect, and each is a subsidy. Suppose the great steel-manufacturing plants of this country or the railroads or the banks were by law exempted from payment of taxes and the burden of taxation thereby made the heavier on the rest of the people; would there be any justice in that?

It is estimated that the maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal will cost the people of this country about $17,000,000 per year. It is estimated that the tolls paid by oversea vessels will amount to about $11,000,000 per annum, leaving a deficit of $6,000,000 per annum to be paid by the people of this country. It is estimated that if our coastwise ships should be required to pay toll, they would contribute about $1,000,000 per year to the lessening of the deficit. Manifestly, if they should not be required to pay toll, that $1,000,000 per year, or whatever it may be found to amount to, would have to be paid by the people of this country. Why should the people of this country pay something for the benefit of a few owners of coastwise vessels? The question is, Shall the owners of the vessels pay their toll, or shall the people of this country pay it for them? If the owners of the vessels be not required to pay, the people of the country must pay, and the result is the special privilege of exemption to a favored few at the expense of the masses, and, according to my understanding, that is undemocratic.

It has been estimated that the actual cost to this Government, the actual outlay of cash which the Government will be required to make to put the average American coastwise ship through the canal, will be $2,000. The shipowner will get the benefit of that, and should he be exempted from tolls would not have to pay anything for it, whatever the actual cost might be. He would be getting something for nothing, apparently. I say apparently, because there is no such thing in the economic world as getting something of value for nothing. It may not cost the recipient anything, but it will cost somebody. Somebody has to pay for it. In this case the shipowner would not pay for it, but you and I, everybody, the toiling masses of the country, would pay for it. Would that be right? I believe the worst thing that can be taught a man is that he can get something for nothing. He may try it and succeed so far as cost to him is concerned, but it will cost somebody else something, and if the right man does not bear the cost, somebody else, who should not bear the cost, will have to bear it. It inculcates economic dishonesty.

All the arguments, all the oratory, all the eloquence, all the logic, all the reasoning, all the learning, all the appeals to national pride and patriotism in the world can not get around the solid fact that for a shipowner to have a ship put through the Panama Canal at a cost of $2,000 to the Government of the United States, or of any other sum whatsoever, and at no cost to him, would be giving him something for nothing, but that the people of the United States would have to bear the cost. That is the solid rock in the pathway of those who oppose repeal which can not be evaded nor wiped out of existence. It is a plain, simple fact, of which there can be no denial.

The people of this country have protested for years against a protective tariff. The clamor against it has been loud, long, and strong. The people have decided by their ballots that a law, under the guise of protection to American industries, which legislates money out of the pockets of the masses into the pockets of a few manufacturers, is wrong and they have repudiated it as special privilege, contrary to the principles of our Government. For myself I fail to see any difference in principle between protection per se, which levies a tribute upon each of many people and dumps the whole thing into the pockets of a few favored manufacturers, and giving to a few favored coastwise shipowners exemption from tolls at an expense which must be borne by all of the people, a little bit from each one of many for the benefit of a few. I am as much opposed to it as I am opposed to a protective tariff. I consider it as undemocratic as I consider the protective tariff system. Each is protection, favoritism, largess, bounty donation.

It has been said that the people would get the benefit of this toll exemption in the way of reduced freight rates, but there is no assurance of that. I have heard of no offer by American coastwise shipowners, nor any guaranty nor suggestion from them, that they would so lower rates as to give the people the benefit of this exemption. There is no guaranty. In my opinion, no reliance is to be placed upon it. It is giving away substance for shadow. It is giving away something in hand in hopes of getting the same back. Why not keep it while we have it? Why give it away and trust to the generosity of a monopoly to return this largess to the people? Is it not better to keep it in the first instance and know that we will have it, and take no chance on getting it back? Why throw away something in hopes that you will find it and get it back? Do prudent men throw away money and take chances on finding it? To my mind it is unsound and indefensible economy. For many years we have heard the specious claim that in the increased wages paid to American workingmen and the creation of new markets the money taken from the pockets of the masses and bestowed upon a few manufacturers by the protective tariff is returned to the people; but the American people have repudiated that claim. Equally as sophistic and fallacious, in my opinion, is the claim now made that the people would get back the bounty bestowed upon coastwise shipowners by exempting them from payment of tolls. The people are tired of being fooled by monopoly.

The truth of the matter is that American coastwise ships can be charged the regulation toll for passage through the Panama Canal and then they could undercharge by far the transportation charges of transcontinental railroads. The people can get the benefit of an enormous reduction and still charge coastwise ships toll and get what is due for putting such ships through the canal. As to transcontinental railroad rates, it is my understanding that the Interstate Commerce Commission, a body in which the people have great confidence, is clothed with authority to fix interstate freight rates. The transcontinental railroads, great promoters of civilization and prosperity, are entitled to a reasonable rate of interest on their investments, and their rates should not be lowered below that, neither by competition nor by law, and when they charge more than that the Interstate Commerce Commission has all the power needed to reduce their rates.

Expert testimony before investigating committees of the House and Senate shows that the use of the Panama Canal by American coastwise ships in transporting freight between Atlantic and Pacific coast points will save them in cost of transportation from $3 to $3.50 per ton. The toll rate has been fixed at $1.20 per ton for such vessels as are to pay. Thus, it will be seen, coastwise ships could pay the toll of $1.20 per ton and still save in cost of transportation from $1.80 to $2.30 per ton. This alone, if the people should get the benefit of it, would make stanch competition for the transcontinental railroads and result in great saving to the people, at the same time causing no loss to the people by the donation of toll costs to the owners of such ships. Is not that good enough? As a good-sized coastwise ship can carry 5,000 tons of freight at a trip, the saving to the people, if they are really to get the benefit, would be on one trip of such a ship, even though it pay its tolls, an average of $10,250.

It is said that the American and Canadian transcontinental railways are opposed to toll exemption for American coastwise ships. That should scare nobody. If such exemption is wrong, the railroads have a right to oppose it and to voice such opposition, although I have heard none of it, if there be any. That is beside the question. The question should be decided on its merits, on a test of right or wrong, regardless of the attitude of the railroads or anything or anybody else.

American coastwise shipping is already a monopoly. Foreign ships are forbidden by law to engage in the coastwise trade. American ships have a monopoly of it, and now, in addition to that, some would give them a subsidy, largess, bounty, donation, exemption from taxation. Are the American people in favor of giving subsidies to monopolies? If so, there is more than one monopoly that would like to have a subsidy and exemption from taxation. It would doubtless be very pleasing to the American coastwise shipowners to be exempted from payment of tolls. Suppose Congress should enact a law that all professional men, when traveling on business, need pay no railroad fare, on the theory that when they should arrive at their destinations they would charge their clients or patients less than otherwise and the people would get the benefit of the exemption. The professional men would doubtless be pleased, but would the people submit to that? Suppose all bankers, merchants, and business men were by law exempted from payment of interstate railroad fare. Would the people consider that fair? The Government has authorized the building of a railroad in Alaska. Suppose it should enact a law that all bona fide residents of Alaska should be allowed to travel and ship freight on that railroad without cost to them. The people of the United States would have to pay the cost thereof; and would the people of this country uphold that sort of discriminatory legislation at their cost?

It has been urged that the Government has spent millions of dollars in improving its rivers and other internal waterways, and that therefore steamboats operated on them should be charged for that privilege if coastwise ships are to be charged canal tolls. The illustration is not analogous. Our rivers are there by nature—the gifts of God to the people. We have no moral right to charge for the operation of steamboats on our inland waterways. There was no money invested by us in the creation or placing of them. They were put there without cost to us. The mere fact that we choose to appropriate some money to improve them and keep them in order gives us no right to take away from any man the inherent right to operate a steamboat on a great God-given internal waterway, placed there by the Creator for the benefit of all His creatures. We may spend money thereon or not, as we deem best, but any amount of money that we may spend in the improvement thereof is so insignificant as compared with what might be computed in dollars and cents as the equivalent of the original value thereof that it would give us no right to deny any man the right to operate a craft thereon.

To the contrary, we constructed the Panama Canal at the expense of the whole people, at the enormous cost of nearly $400,000,000, and it is our duty to recompense the whole people as much as possible for that tremendous outlay of their money. Col. Goethals, the constructor of the canal, takes the position that those who use it should pay for the privilege, and that it is the duty of the United States to recoup itself as far as possible for the enormous cost of the construction of the canal.

Much has been said about repeal of the toll-exemption law at the dictation of Great Britain. Great Britain protested against it before the enactment thereof, but since its enactment not a word of protest is being heard from Great Britain. Great Britain is not dictating nor demanding the repeal of the toll-exemption law. Nobody is acting at the behest or under the dictation of Great Britain. That assertion will scare nobody. There is nothing to it. President Wilson is not acting at the dictation or behest of Great Britain, and nobody believes he is. Neither are those who are acting with him. President Wilson is looked upon by the overwhelming majority of the people of this country, regardless of politics, as an able, wise, sincere, conscientious, patriotic citizen, who, as man and President, wants to do right and is trying to do right, and trying in a far-seeing, wise, patriotic, unbiased, unprejudiced manner. The people of the country have confidence in his integrity and good intentions.

It has been urged by some with much plausibility and earnestness that the Democratic national platform having declared in favor of toll exemption for American coastwise ships Democrats are bound thereby and should vote against repeal. It matters not how that plank got into the Democratic platform. It rather appears to me that while we were at Baltimore zealously guarding the Democratic national convention against the encroachments of certain big interests and privilege-seeking monopolies, which we feared, a plank was inserted in favor of one monopoly the significance of which failed to catch the attention of the convention.

So far as I am concerned, I am not disturbed about that plank in the Democratic platform. No platform, no party, no power on earth has the right to make me do what I think is wrong. I put right above party platform. I consider that plank un-Democratic and contrary to the fundamental principle of Democracy, which is equal rights to all and special privileges to none. I do not feel bound by any plank in any platform which I deem distinctively un-Democratic and morally wrong. If a Democratic platform contained a declaration in favor of a protective tariff as such, protection per se, I should unhesitatingly renounce it. I would not feel bound by it, because it would be at variance with all the tenets of Democracy. I do not believe, if a Democratic platform should contain a bald declaration in favor of robbery, I would feel bound by it. I consider protection as nothing but legislative robbery, and I consider toll exemption for American coastwise ships legislative robbery of the people for the benefit of a monopoly. I do not believe in favoring monopolies. Therefore I feel no more bound by this declaration than if it were a declaration of so many words in favor of plain extortion.

I do not believe, anyway, that this declaration in the Democratic national platform had anything to do with the result of the last election—do not believe that the election was influenced by it in the slightest degree. I do not believe that the great majority of the voters knew it was in the Democratic platform nor that one voter out of thousands who may have known it realized its significance. I do not believe it influenced any voters in my State. I have no recollection of having heard it mentioned there. It is charged by some that the President has changed his mind on this question. I do not know that he has. He may possibly feel that conditions have changed. Should he have changed his mind—which I do not know and of which I do not profess to speak—it would not be the first time he had honestly changed his mind when convinced he had been wrong, nor is he the only honest man who has ever changed his mind. In part, the fact that he is President is due to the fact that he is honest and courageous enough to change his mind when convinced that it is right to do so. One of the greatest marks of an honest man is the courage to declare a change of convictions.

While I had decided in my own mind, before the President delivered his message, that toll exemption for coastwise ships was wrong and should be repealed, even had I not so decided, I would be willing to grant the President's request for repeal. He is at the head of our Government. He is the head of the administration. He is more intimately acquainted with foreign affairs than I. In such matters he knows better than I what is best for the country and the people. I have confidence in his wisdom, ability, integrity, patriotism, and devotion to principle. I believe he is fighting an earnest battle for the rights of the people. An army which does not follow its leader will not accomplish anything. I am willing to follow the leader in matters where I have no settled convictions to the contrary or which are not contrary to my conscience. Of course, where I have settled convictions to the contrary or in matters of conscience I am not willing to follow anyone, but otherwise I follow the leader. I have confidence in the President. The people have confidence in him. He is the President of the whole people, regardless of party. I believe he is able, courageous, and honest. When he asks us to repeal the toll-exemption law and says, "I shall not know how to deal with other matters of even greater delicacy and nearer consequence if you do not grant it to me in ungrudging measure," I believe he means what he says and knows what he is talking about, and I am in favor of granting his request. He makes that request not in a party sense nor of us as partisans. He makes it as President of the whole people; makes it of us as Senators, Americans, patriots, regardless of party; and in that sense I here refer to it and favor granting it. In such matters as this he is the leader of all of us—leader in a larger sense than a political sense, in a higher sphere than that of political platforms.

A number of amendments have been offered to the pending bill for repeal. I prefer the bill exactly as it came from the House, without any amendment. I have no particular objection to the amendment suggested by the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, but do not see any need of it. If we have a right to do this thing—repeal the exemption law—it is our privilege to do so outright. If we have no right to do it, we should not do it. I do not believe the amendment offered by the committee adds to or detracts from our rights in the premises. Therefore I would prefer the bill without the amendment, but have no serious objection to it. As to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], to refer the matter to the people at the next election, I know of but one thing to be gained by it, and that is delay.

If the proposed repeal is violative of a treaty, no vote of the people could make it right. If it is not violative, no vote of the people could make it less so. I need no vote of the people to instruct me on the economic phase of the question. It is our business to dispose of this matter, and we should not shirk it by trying to shuffle it off on to the people. As to other amendments offered, I do not believe they better conditions. This is an issue that is before us for settlement. We should meet it directly and without qualification. This Congress is the body which should pass upon the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is a political question. Here and now I consider the place and time to settle this. I believe we should either repeal the exemption or refuse to repeal it, and that it should be settled here and now as to what our policy in that regard will be. I believe we are the people to do it; it is our duty; and I am for outright repeal. I am opposed to the delay arbitration would cause. I am for immediate action.

I believe that the large thing to do is the only thing that we can afford to do. I believe we should act in this matter upon and in accord with the lofty principle of benefit to all mankind in which it was originally conceived; free from all selfishness and suspicion of narrowness. Let us do what we started out to do—erect and perpetuate a lasting monument of great achievement which will show to the world that the American heart throbs with love of all mankind; that the American people are large enough to do a great thing which will redound for all time to the common advancement of the civilization, commerce, prosperity, friendly intercourse, enlightenment, and welfare of all the world, the common good of all mankind—without seeking any paltry, selfish advantage or seeking to give a few dollars to an American monopoly; thus showing that we not only believe in the brotherhood of all mankind, the community of interest of all nations, but that we act in that belief and prove it by our acts. With great respect for the profound learning and honest convictions of those who differ from me, I shall vote for repeal.

I here produce and make a part of my remarks and ask to have incorporated in the RECORD copies of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and our treaty with the Republic of Panama for the acquisition of the canal strip.

HAY-PAUNCEFOTE TREATY.

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty, Edward VII, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States, who, having communicated to each other their full powers which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

"ARTICLE 2.

"It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscriptions to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 28th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal; that is to say:

"1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation or its citizens or subjects in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic, or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

"2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

"3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

"Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

"4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

"5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

"6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

"ARTICLE 4.

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date thereof

"In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and thereunto affixed their seals.

"Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and one.

TREATY WITH REPUBLIC OF PANAMA.

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama, being desirous to insure the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Panama to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and the Congress of the United States of America having passed an act approved June 28, 1902, in furtherance of that object, by which the President of the United States is authorized to acquire within a reasonable time the control of the necessary territory of the Republic of Colombia, and the sovereignty of such territory being actually vested in the Republic of Panama, the high contracting parties have resolved for that purpose to conclude a convention and have accordingly appointed as their plenipotentiaries—

The President of the United States of America, John Hay, Secretary of State; and

The Government of the Republic of Panama, Philippe Bunau-Varilla, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Republic of Panama, thereunto specially empowered by said Government, who after communicating with each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

"ARTICLE 1.

"The United States guarantees and will maintain the independence of the Republic of Panama.

"ARTICLE 2.

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of a zone of land and land under water for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said canal of the width of 10 miles, extending to the distance of 5 miles on each side of the center line of the route of the canal to be constructed; the said zone beginning in the Caribbean Sea 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark and extending to and across the Isthmus of Panama into the Pacific Ocean to a distance of 3 marine miles from mean low-water mark, with the proviso that the cities of Panama and Colon and the harbors adjacent to said cities, which are included within the boundaries of the zone above described, shall not be included within this grant. The Republic of Panama further grants to the United States in perpetuity the use, occupation, and control of any other lands and waters outside of the zone above described which may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of any auxiliary canals or other works necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of said enterprise.

"The Republic of Panama further grants in like manner to the United States in perpetuity all islands within the limits of the zone above described, and in addition thereto the group of small islands in the Bay of Panama, named Perico, Naos, Culebra, and Flamenco.

"ARTICLE 3.

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all the rights, power, and authority within the zone mentioned and described in article 2 of this agreement and within the limits of all auxiliary lands and waters mentioned and described in said article 2 which the United States would possess and exercise, if it were sovereign of the territory within which said lands and waters are located, to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority.

"ARTICLE 4.

"As rights subsidiary to the above grants the Republic of Panama grants in perpetuity to the United States the right to use the rivers, streams, lakes, and other bodies of water within its limits for navigation, the supply of water, or water power, or other purposes, so far as the use of said rivers, streams, lakes, and bodies of water, and the waters thereof, may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal.

"ARTICLE 5.

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States in perpetuity a monopoly for the construction, maintenance, and operation of any system of communication by means of canal or railroad across its territory between the Caribbean Sea and the Pacific Ocean.

"ARTICLE 6.

"The grants herein contained shall in no manner invalidate the titles or rights of private land holders or owners of private property in the said zone or in or to any of the lands or waters granted to the United States by the provisions of any article of this treaty, nor shall they interfere with the rights of way over the public roads passing through the said zone or over any of the said lands or waters unless said rights of way or private rights shall conflict with rights herein granted to the United States, in which case the rights of the United States shall be superior. All damages caused to the owners of private lands or private property of any kind by reason of the grants contained in this treaty or by reason of the operations of the United States, its agents or employees, or by reason of the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal or of the works of sanitation and protection herein provided for, shall be appraised and settled by a joint commission appointed by the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panma, whose decisions as to such damages shall be final and whose awards as to such damages shall be paid solely by the United States. No part of the work on said canal or the Panama Railroad or on any auxiliary works relating thereto and authorized by the terms of this treaty shall be prevented, delayed, or impeded by or pending such proceedings to ascertain such damages. The appraisal of said private lands and private property and the assessment of damages to them shall be based upon their value before the date of this convention.

"ARTICLE 7.

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States within the limits of the cities of Panama and Colon and their adjacent harbors and within the territory adjacent thereto the right to acquire by purchase or by the exercise of the right of eminent domain, any lands, buildings, water rights, or other properties necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, and protection of the canal and of any works of sanitation, such as the collection and disposition of sewage and the distribution of water in the said cities of Panama and Colon, which, in the discretion of the United States may be necessary and convenient for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the said canal and railroad. All such works of sanitation, collection and disposition of sewage, and distribution of water in the cities of Panama and Colon shall be made at the expense of the United States, and the Government of the United States, its agents, or nominees shall be authorized to impose and collect water rates and sewage rates which shall be sufficient to provide for the payment of interest and the amortization of the principal of the cost of said works within a period of 50 years, and upon the expiration of said term of 50 years the system of sewers and waterworks shall revert to and become the properties of the cities of Panama and Colon, respectively, and the use of the water shall be free to the inhabitants of Panama and Colon, except to the extent that water rates may be necessary for the operation and maintenance of said system of sewers and water.

"The Republic of Panama agrees that the cities of Panama and Colon shall comply in perpetuity with the sanitary ordinances, whether of a preventive or curative character, prescribed by the United States, and in case the Government of Panama is unable or fails in its duty to enforce this compliance by the cities of Panama and Colon with the sanitary ordinances of the United States the Republic of Panama grants to the United States the right and authority to enforce the same.

"The same right and authority are granted to the United States for the maintenance of public order in the cities of Panama and Colon and the territories and harbors adjacent thereto in case the Republic of Panama should not be, in the judgment of the United States, able to maintain such order.

"ARTICLE 8.

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States all rights which it now has or hereafter may acquire to the property of the New Panama Canal Co. and the Panama Railroad Co. as a result of the transfer of sovereignty from the Republic of Colombia to the Republic of Panama over the Isthmus of Panama and authorizes the New Panama Canal Co. to sell and transfer to the United States its rights, privileges, properties, and concessions, as well as the Panama Railroad and all the shares or part of the shares of that company; but the public lands situated outside of the zone described in article 2 of this treaty now included in the concessions to both said enterprises and not required in the construction or operation of the canal shall revert to the Republic of Panama, except any property now owned by or in the possession of said companies within Panama or Colon or the ports or terminals thereof.

"ARTICLE 9.

"The United States agrees that the ports at either entrance of the canal and the waters thereof, and the Republic of Panama agrees that the towns of Panama and Colon shall be free for all time, so that there shall not be imposed or collected customhouse tolls, tonnage, anchorage, lighthouse, wharf, pilot, or quarantine dues or any other charges or taxes of any kind upon any vessel using or passing through the canal or belonging to or employed by the United States, directly or indirectly, in connection with the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the main canal, or auxiliary works, or upon the cargo, officers, crew, or passengers of any such vessels, except such tolls and charges as may be imposed by the United States for the use of the canal and other works, and except tolls and charges imposed by the Republic of Panama upon merchandise destined to be introduced for the consumption of the rest of the Republic of Panama, and upon vessels touching at the ports of Colon and Panama and which do not cross the canal.

"The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to establish in such ports and in the towns of Panama and Colon such houses and guards as it may deem necessary to collect duties on importations destined to other portions of Panama and to prevent contraband trade. The United States shall have the right to make use of the towns and harbors of Panama and Colon as places of anchorage, and for making repairs, for loading, unloading, depositing, or transshipping cargoes either in transit or destined for the service of the canal and for other works pertaining to the canal.

"ARTICLE 10.

"The Republic of Panama agrees that there shall not be imposed any taxes, national, municipal, departmental, or of any other class, upon the canal, the railways and auxiliary works, tugs and other vessels employed in the service of the canal, storehouses, workshops, offices, quarters for laborers, factories of all kinds, warehouses, wharves, machinery, and other works, property, and effects appertaining to the canal or railroad and auxiliary works, or their officers or employees, situated within the cities of Panama and Colon, and that there shall not be imposed contributions or charges of a personal character of any kind upon officers, employees, laborers, and other individuals in the service of the canal and railroad and auxiliary works.

"ARTICLE 11.

"The United States agrees that the official dispatches of the Government of the Republic of Panama shall be transmitted over any telegraph and telephone lines established for canal purposes and used for public and private business at rates not higher than those required from officials in the service of the United States.

"ARTICLE 12.

"The Government of the Republic of Panama shall permit the immigration and free access to the lands and workshops of the canal and its auxiliary works of all employees and workmen of whatever nationality under contract to work upon or seeking employment upon or in any wise connected with the said canal and its auxiliary works, with their respective families, and all such persons shall be free and exempt from the military service of the Republic of Panama.

"ARTICLE 13.

"The United States may import at any time into the said zone and auxiliary lands, free of customs duties, imposts, taxes, or other charges, and without any restrictions, any and all vessels, dredges, engines, cars, machinery, tools, explosives, materials, supplies, and other articles necessary and convenient in the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal and auxiliary works, and all provisions, medicines, clothing, supplies, and other things necessary and convenient for the officers, employees, workmen, and laborers in the service and employ of the United States and for their families. If any such articles are disposed of for use outside of the zone and auxiliary lands granted to the United States and within the territory of the Republic, they shall be subject to the same import or other duties as like articles imported under the laws of the Republic of Panama.

"ARTICLE 14.

"As the price or compensation for the rights, powers, and privileges granted in this convention by the Republic of Panama to the United States, the Government of the United States agrees to pay to the Republic of Panama the sum of $10,000,000 in gold coin of the United States on the exchange of the ratification of this convention and also an annual payment during the life of this convention of $250,000 in like gold coin, beginning nine years after the date aforesaid.

"The provisions of this article shall be in addition to all other benefits assured to the Republic of Panama under this convention.

"But no delay or difference of opinion under this article or any other provisions of this treaty shall affect or interrupt the full operation and effect of this convention in all other respects.

"ARTICLE 15.

"The joint commission referred to in article 6 shall be established as follows:

"The President of the United States shall nominate two persons and the President of the Republic of Panama shall nominate two persons, and they shall proceed to a decision; but in case of disagreement of the commission (by reason of their being equally divided in conclusion) an umpire shall be appointed by the two Governments, who shall render the decision. In the event of the death, absence, or incapacity of a commissioner or umpire, or of his omitting, declining, or ceasing to act, his place shall be filled by the appointment of another person in the manner above indicated. All decisions by a majority of the commission or by the umpire shall be final.

"ARTICLE 16.

"The two Governments shall make adequate provision by future agreement for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery within said zone and auxiliary lands to the authorities of the Republic of Panama of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, or misdemeanors without said zone, and for the pursuit, capture, imprisonment, detention, and delivery without said zone to the authorities of the United States of persons charged with the commitment of crimes, felonies, and misdemeanors within said zone and auxiliary lands.

"ARTICLE 17.

"The Republic of Panama grants to the United States the use of all the ports of the Republic open to commerce as places of refuge for any vessels employed in the canal enterprise and for all vessels passing or bound to pass through the canal which may be in distress and be driven to seek refuge in said ports. Such vessels shall be exempt from anchorage and tonnage dues on the part of the Republic of Panama.

"ARTICLE 18.

"The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of and in conformity with the stipulations of the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

"ARTICLE 19.

"The Government of the Republic of Panama shall have the right to transport over the canal its vessels and its troops and munitions of war in such vessels at all times without paying charges of any kind. The exemption is to be extended to the auxiliary railway for the transportation of persons in the service of the Republic of Panama, or of the police force charged with the preservation of public order outside of said zone, as well as to their baggage, munitions of war, and supplies.

"ARTICLE 20.

"If by virtue of any existing treaty in relation to the territory of the Isthmus of Panama, whereof the obligations shall descend or be assumed by the Republic of Panama, there may be any privilege or concession in favor of the Government or the citizens or subjects of a third power relative to an interoceanic means of communication which in any of its terms may be incompatible with the terms of the present convention, the Republic of Panama agrees to cancel or modify such treaty in due form, for which purpose it shall give to the said third power the requisite notification within the term of four months from the date of the present convention, and in case the existing treaty contains no clause permitting its modifications or annulment, the Republic of Panama agrees to procure its modification or annulment in such form that there shall not exist any conflict with the stipulations of the present convention.

"ARTICLE 21.

"The rights and privileges granted by the Republic of Panama to the United States in the preceding articles are understood to be free of all anterior debts, liens, trusts, or liabilities or concessions or privileges to other Governments, corporations, syndicates, or individuals, and consequently, if there should arise any claims on account of the present concessions and privileges or otherwise, the claimants shall resort to the Government of the Republic of Panama, and not to the United States for any indemnity or compromise which may be required.

"ARTICLE 22.

"The Republic of Panama renounces and grants to the United States the participation to which it might be entitled in the future earnings of the canal under article 15 of the concessionary contract with Lucien N. B. Wyse, now owned by the New Panama Canal Co., and any and all other rights or claims of a pecuniary nature arising under or relating to said concession or arising under or relating to the concessions to the Panama Railroad Co. or any extension or modification thereof; and it likewise renounces, confirms, and grants to the United States, now and hereafter, all the rights and property reserved in the said concessions which otherwise would belong to Panama at or before the expiration of the terms of 99 years of the concessions granted to or held by the above-mentioned party and companies, and all right, title, and interest which it now has or may hereafter have in and to the lands, canal, works, property, and rights held by the said companies under said concessions or otherwise and acquired or to be acquired by the United States from or through the New Panama Canal Co., including any property and rights which might or may in the future, either by lapse of time, forfeiture, or otherwise, revert to the Republic of Panama under any contracts or concessions with said Wyse, the Universal Panama Canal Co., the Panama Railroad Co., and the New Panama Canal Co.

The aforesaid rights and property shall be and are free and released from any present or reversionary interest or claims of Panama, and the title of the United States thereto upon consummation of the contemplated purchase by the United States from the New Panama Canal Co. shall be absolute, so far as concerns the Republic of Panama, excepting always the rights of the Republic specifically secured under this treaty.

"ARTICLE 23.

"ARTICLE 24.

"No change either in the government or in the laws and treaties of the Republic of Panama shall, without the consent of the United States, affect any right of the United States under the present convention, or under any treaty stipulation between the two countries that now exists or may hereafter exist touching the subject matter of this convention.

"If the Republic of Panama shall hereafter enter as a constituent into any other government, or into any union or confederation of states, so as to merge her sovereignty or independence in such government, union, or confederation, the rights of the United States under this convention shall not be in any respect lessened or impaired.

"ARTICLE 25.

"For the better performance of the engagements of this convention and to the end of the efficient protection of the canal and the preservation of its neutrality, the Government of the Republic of Panama will sell or lease to the United States lands adequate and necessary for naval or coaling stations on the Pacific coast and on the western Caribbean coast of the Republic at certain points to be agreed upon with the President of the United States.

"JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
"P. BUNAU-VARILLA. [SEAL.]"

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones	Oliver	Stephenson
Borah	Kenyon	Overman	Swanson
Bristow	Kern	Page	Thomas
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Perkins	Thompson
Burton	Lewis	Pomerene	Thornton
Catron	Lippitt	Root	Tillman
Chamberlain	Lodge	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Chilton	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Walsh
Clark, Wyo.	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Warren
Cummins	Myers	Shively	West
Goff	Nelson	Simmons	White
Gronna	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Hughes	O'Gorman	Smoot

Mr. THORNTON. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not know whether there is any other Senator who desires to discuss the tolls question to-day. If there is no one prepared to go on now, I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. KERN. If there are no further arguments to be made upon the bill, I do not see why it should be laid aside. If the debate is ended, I think we should proceed to dispose of the bill.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The Senator might well know that the debate is not ended. Notice, I think, has been given by at least one Senator to speak on Wednesday morning. I know of at least two others who expect to speak during the week. While there may be reasons why a vote on the tolls bill should be expedited, I know equally good reasons for the expedition of the vote on the naval appropriation bill, which had the attention of the Senate for most of last Friday. It may be remembered that after a protracted discussion regarding certain features of that bill we were compelled to adjourn at half past 6 in the evening, because of the absence of a quorum which was needed at the time we were taking a vote, and most of us assumed, when we adjourned at half past 6 Friday evening, that at the earliest opportunity to-day we would resume the consideration of the naval appropriation bill and proceed to take a vote upon the question which was then pending and which had, indeed, the attention of the Senate for three or four hours.

I know of no one who desires to delay a vote on the tolls question. My own judgment is that all who desire to speak will have made their speeches by Thursday or Friday of this week, at which time we can proceed to vote without delaying action on other matters of vital importance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from New York, who represents one side of this controversy, whether we can not now agree upon some time for taking the vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Personally I shall have no objection to agreeing upon some hour on Friday. I think by that time every Senator who desires to speak will have spoken.

Mr. SIMMONS. I trust the Senator will ask for unanimous consent that that shall be done; and if he does not, I will make the request.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If there be no objection, I ask that we proceed to vote at 4 o'clock on Friday of this week.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no disposition to delay a vote upon the bill, but I am constrained to object to fixing an hour for voting upon it. Whenever the majority feels that we ought to consider the bill to the exclusion of all others until a vote is reached upon it, I at least can see no objection to that course; in fact, I think that is the course which ought to be pursued. I shall object at any time to a unanimous-consent agreement for fixing an hour to vote upon the bill. I have no objection to holding it under consideration until we do reach a vote.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Would the Senator have any objection to an agreement to proceed with the consideration of the pending tolls bill to the exclusion of all other business beginning on Wednesday morning of this week?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Personally I have no objection.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The reason why I suggest Wednesday is that one Senator has given notice that he will speak on Wednesday morning.

Mr. CUMMINS. One objection will be unavailing, because the majority has it in its own hands to proceed with the consideration of the bill until we reach a vote. I would have no objection to agreeing to do what the majority has it in its power to do, nor do I see any reason for not so doing. My position is that whatever debate occurs hereafter upon the bill ought to occur under such circumstances as that a vote upon the bill or upon some amendment to it can be taken whenever the debate closes. This measure is peculiar in some respects, and I do not think the Senate ought to agree to vote at a specified time upon it. It ought to vote whenever Senators no longer care to speak upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa will permit me, the Senator sees—I think he must see—that if an individual Senator is able to control this matter by simply giving notice that he will make a speech at some future day, the whole Senate may be indefinitely held up from reaching a final vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think it ought to be indefinitely held up.

Mr. SIMMONS. Neither do I.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, I believe in that kind of debate which is to be followed by action.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I want to ask the Senator from North Carolina if I understand he objects to the proposal I have submitted to the Senate—that after the morning business on Wednesday of this week we take up the tolls bill and proceed, to the exclusion of all other business, with the consideration of the bill down to a vote?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will ask the Senator if, in the place of "Wednesday," he would not be willing to insert "Tuesday morning"?

Mr. O'GORMAN. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. There will be debate sufficient to carry the matter over until Wednesday. The Senator who has given notice that he will speak on Wednesday will not then lose his opportunity.

Mr. KERN. He will be entirely in order.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the Senator who has announced that he will speak on Wednesday is here, I will say that it is largely out of deference to his notice that I have made the suggestion. I refer to the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

Mr. SIMMONS. The junior Senator from Mississippi is here.

Mr. O'GORMAN. If the junior Senator from Mississippi has no objection to proceeding on Tuesday rather than on Wednesday, I have no objection.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHAFROTH in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I was assured that a vote could not possibly be reached before Wednesday afternoon; indeed I thought all of the intervening time would be taken up by the Senate in the discussion of this question. I shall not be prepared to discuss it until that time.

Mr. KERN. The Senator does not object to our taking up the bill to-morrow?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have no objection to the bill being taken up now or to its being taken up at any time; certainly not. The bill has been up to-day. I had no idea there would be any effort to insist upon a vote earlier than Wednesday. I do not see the necessity for this haste. Senators want to discuss the matter. Its discussion has not interfered with the other business before the Senate. I shall not consume very much of the time of the Senate on Wednesday, and I am willing to vote at any time after that when the Senate may desire to vote on the question.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, to indicate to the Senate the attitude of the committee, I now give notice that beginning on Wednesday morning next after the conclusion of morning business the tolls bill will be kept before the Senate to the exclusion of all other business until such time as a vote may be reached in due course. I now ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. THORNTON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14034) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment on page 56, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CLAPP. Let the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote on the yeas and nays disclosed the lack of a quorum on Friday evening, and the Senate adjourned with the question pending.

Mr. CLAPP. May we not have the amendment again stated, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. Under the heading of "Increase of the Navy," on page 56, beginning with the word "One," in line 20, the committee proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph. To that amendment Mr. O'GORMAN offered an amendment to strike out, beginning with the words "and the Secretary of the Navy," in line 22, the remainder of the paragraph. The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, agreed to that amendment.

Mr. CHILTON. What is the pending amendment?

The SECRETARY. So that the following words remain in the House text:

> One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

And the remainder of the paragraph is stricken out.

Mr. CHILTON. Now, what is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it but fair for the Chair to state before the vote is taken upon the amendment as amended that there is this parliamentary situation confronting the Senate: The Senate committee amendment has already been stated by the Secretary. The amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] to the amendment struck out the latter clause only of the amendment as proposed by the committee. The amendment as amended is now the question upon which the Senate is to vote. The parliamentary situation is that, if the amendment as amended be defeated, then does that simply leave in the bill the following words:

> One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard—

Or does it leave in the bill the entire paragraph as it came from the other House? The Chair is impressed with the idea that if the amendment as amended fails of adoption by the Senate, the entire paragraph remains in the bill, notwithstanding the vote on the amendment as proposed by the Senator from

New York. The Chair feels inclined to make this statement now before the vote is taken on the amendment as amended to the end that, if the Senate do not agree with the opinion of the Chair, it may be otherwise decided by the Senate; or, if the Senate do agree with the ruling of the Chair and desire to take any step whereby the parliamentary situation may be cleared up and the vote be taken simply upon the question of either leaving in the bill or striking out of the bill the paragraph—

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard—

That such step may be now taken.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not quite concluded the opinion of the Chair; when the Chair shall have done so, he will then hear the Senator from New Jersey.

In other words, the Chair is impressed with the view that, as the parliamentary situation is now, whichever way the vote goes, either the paragraph in its entirety will stay in or the first clause of the paragraph will stay in the bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair stated that he would first recognize the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to know if, in the opinion of the Chair, a vote of "nay" strikes out all of the amendment but leaves the paragraph in the bill as it came from the other House, then would it be possible to offer another amendment to carry out the wishes of the Senate immediately thereafter and to carry out the will of the Senate as expressed on the last day when the Senate considered this proposition? My understanding of this amendment, I will say to the Chair, on Friday night was that a vote of "nay" left the language in the bill:

One battleship hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that a vote "yea" would leave that language in the bill, because it is the amendment as amended, and that a vote "nay" would leave the entire paragraph in.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, that is the reverse of the way we voted on Friday night. It seems to me the situation is this: The committee offered an amendment striking out the entire clause. Then an amendment was offered by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] striking only a part of it out. That was carried; that is to strike out the Senate committee amendment; and that amendment was amended to that extent. Now, the committee amendment having been amended to that extent, it is impossible for the Senate to again vote to strike it out. So that the only question that comes up is to strike out the portion which has been left in by the amendment of the Senator from New York to the committee amendment. It would seem to me that a vote of "nay" would leave that in the bill and a vote of "yea" would let it go out, as we voted on Friday night last. It seems to me the decision of the Chair on Friday was clearly correct. The question is now, Shall we keep in the bill the part first amended by the committee's amendment as presented by the Senator from New York?

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Chair feels that, in justice to the Senator from New York, who did not, in the opinion of the Chair, present his amendment in parliamentary language—the Chair having changed the language of the Senator from New York—the Chair feels, in justice to him, that the situation ought to be explained to the Senate.

The amendment as offered in the language of the Senator from New York was on page 56 to amend the committee amendment by retaining in lines 20, 21, and 22, the words "One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard." That was the real purpose of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, to leave this language in the bill and to strike out the remainder of the paragraph; so that, taking into consideration the intention of the Senator from New York, the amendment as amended must be carried in order to comply with the real intention of the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. By common consent and acquiescence and construction on Friday the second paragraph of the clause in question was struck out. I apprehend there will be no objection to submitting to the Senate now the amendment as I proposed it in the precise language just read by the presiding officer, so that the Senate may pass upon the definite proposition, as to whether there will be retained in the bill a provision that one of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard, and that there be a vote on that.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask unanimous consent that the proposition be submitted in that way.

Mr. LODGE. If it is possible to go back to the original proposition of the bill, the committee reported to strike out a certain paragraph; that paragraph is obviously divisible; it carries two propositions, and it can be divided on the request of any Senator. If that were done, the first question would be on agreeing to the committee amendment as to the first clause; and the next question would be, Shall the committee amendment be agreed to as to the second clause? Then we would determine which clause shall stay in and which shall go out or whether they shall both remain in or both go out, as the vote may decide.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts very clearly states what may be done under the laws of the Senate; but the situation the Chair felt ought to be explained before the vote was taken.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that the question may be submitted to the Senate in the language suggested in my proposed amendment, namely, that the provision covering the suggestion that "one battleship hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard" shall be retained in the bill.

Mr. LODGE. I think, Mr. President, if the Senator from New York will allow me, that he ought to add to that request the request that the committee amendment be divided.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. And that the vote be taken first on his amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to dividing the question so that the two propositions shall be voted upon separately?

Mr. O'GORMAN. There is no objection to that, as I understand, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. The question will come first on the first clause, and then the question will come on the second clause.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct. The first clause is:

One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard.

The committee proposes to strike that out. A negative vote would leave it in the bill. The yeas and nays have been ordered on that question, and the Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. GOFF (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore will have to withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I am released from that pair on this vote, and I vote "nay."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] which I transfer to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (when the name of Mr. WILLIAMS was called). I am requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], and also that he is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. REED. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I inquire if the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with that Senator, and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. JAMES. I transfer the pair I have with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I desire to announce that the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is absent and paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT].

Mr. LODGE (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], but as he would vote as I have voted on this question I will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and vote "nay."

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the following Senators: The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is paired with the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]; the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], who is paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]; the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS], who is paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]; and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH], who is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM].

Mr. JONES. I understand I can transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I do, and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 15, nays 41, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate disagrees to the first clause of the Senate committee amendment, to wit, the amendment which proposes to strike out the words "One of the battleships hereby authorized shall be built and constructed at a Government navy yard," and those words remain in the bill.

The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee proposing to strike out the second clause of the paragraph, reading:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built with the necessary building slips and equipment, and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed.

Mr. OLIVER. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. OLIVER. I ask if those words have not already been stricken out of the bill on a point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. REED. A parliamentary inquiry. I remember distinctly on Friday raising the point of order——

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was on the amendment proposed to the committee amendment by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], which raised the amount from $200,000 to $400,000; and the Chair sustained the point of order.

Mr. REED. I stand corrected. As I understand, a vote "yea" at the present time is a vote to strike out of the bill the provision for the $200,000 appropriation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A vote "yea" is a vote to strike that out of the bill. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out the second clause of the paragraph. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LODGE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as before, and its transfer, I vote "nay."

Mr. GRONNA (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to my colleague [Mr. MCCUMBER] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JAMES (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). In the absence of my pair, the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], I withhold my vote.

Mr. REED (when his name was called). I make the same transfer that I announced on a previous vote and vote "yea."

Mr. WARREN (when his name was called). Under the same transfer of pair as heretofore announced, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask whether the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Having a pair with that Senator, I withhold my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD (after having voted in the affirmative). I failed to announce my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from California [Mr. WORKS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce that I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and therefore refrained from voting. I also desire to announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent from the city.

Mr. GOFF. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 12, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. So that portion of the committee amendment which asks to strike out of the bill the following words:

And the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to equip such navy yard as he may designate in which the battleship herein authorized is to be built, with the necessary building slips and equipment, and the sum of $200,000, or such part thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for the navy yard designated by the Secretary of the Navy in which the battleship is to be constructed—

Is agreed to, and that language is stricken from the bill.

Mr. LODGE. The committee amendments are not yet concluded.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, while that disposes of the last of the committee amendments that are incorporated in the bill, there are various other amendments which will now be submitted, beginning with the one I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After line 13, on page 6, the committee proposes to insert the following paragraph:

That officers who now perform engineering duty on shore only shall be eligible for any shore duty compatible with their rank and grade to which the Secretary of the Navy may assign them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to know the reasons for that change in the law. Do not officers, when they are on shore duty, get additional pay?

Mr. LODGE. No; they get less.

Mr. BRISTOW. They get less, do they?

Mr. THORNTON. They get less.

Mr. BRISTOW. What is the object of the amendment?

Mr. THORNTON. I will read the object, as stated by the department in its letter to the committee:

The reason for asking for it is that a strict interpretation of existing law narrows the field of duty to which officers who are members of the old Engineer Corps may be assigned. Occasions might arise when it would be desirable to order these officers to other shore duty, where their experience and ability might be availed of, and the proposed amendment would give the Secretary of the Navy the authority necessary to so employ them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Massachusetts please to allow me to complete these amendments, because there probably will be more discussion on the one he wishes to offer than there will be on these. It seems to me we had better get through with those on which there will not be a fight before we take up those on which there will be a fight.

I offer, on behalf of the committee, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 9, after the word "agency," the first word in the line, the committee proposes to insert the words "or agencies," so that, if amended, it will read:

Provided, That authority is hereby granted to employ the services of an advertising agency or agencies, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I offer, on behalf of the committee, the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 17, after the word "reenlistment," the committee proposes to insert "or who has completed four years in the Revenue-Cutter Service and received therefrom an honorable discharge or an ordinary discharge with recommendation for reenlistment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 24, after the word "naval," the first word in the line, the committee proposes to insert "or revenue cutter."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 25, after the words "Marine Corps," the committee proposes to insert "Revenue-Cutter Service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I offer on behalf of the committee the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 21, line 8, after the word "docks," the committee proposes to insert "and Naval Observatory," so that, if amended, it will read:

For general maintenance of yards and docks and Naval Observatory, namely.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I offer on behalf of the committee the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after the figures "$425,000," in line 2, the committee proposes to insert:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated, which actually constitute a part of yard maintenance, shall be charged to yard maintenance.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I will state for the information of any Senator who may desire it that that is in the nature of a substitute for an amendment that went out on a point of order last Wednesday. The object of the other amendment was merely in order that books could be kept so as to show the actual cost of building a ship, and not a fictitious cost. Many Senators said they could not understand the amendment the way it was framed before, and it went out on a point of order, but I think this is so very plain that no one can make the objection that it is not intelligible, and the object of it is good.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I make the point of order that this is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state it again.

The SECRETARY. Under the subhead "Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 22, line 2, after the numerals "$425,000," the committee proposes to insert the following proviso:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated, which actually constitute a part of yard maintenance, shall be charged to yard maintenance.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, before a ruling is made on the question of order I desire to suggest that the amendment proposed by the committee as embraced in the printed copy of the bill went out Wednesday on a similar point of order. The matter in question is urgently needed by the Navy Department. The amendment was incorporated at the special request of the Secretary of the Navy. It was designed to give him a little more freedom with respect to the method of applying disbursements and keeping books of accounts, and with the view particularly of enabling him to know with some accuracy the exact cost of constructing a ship.

After the previous amendment went out on the point of order the department suggested that an amendment in the language now before the Senate would answer the purpose. It seems to me that it is not subject to the point of order made. This is an appropriation bill, and the amendment is germane to the appropriation. It contains an instruction to the officer who will disburse the money as to how he shall account for it on his books, and I submit that it is not new legislation.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the amendment as originally drawn was subject to the point of order, but in its present form it seems to me it is not. Of course it is germane. In its present form it seems to me simply to direct the head under which expenditures for yards and docks appropriated for in this bill shall be classified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would like to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts.

This proviso reads:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated—

Now, there are expenditures appropriated for under very many designations—which actually constitute a part of yard maintenance shall be charged to yard maintenance.

It is not a proviso on the part of the Senate of the United States that the Secretary of the Navy may use any of the sums appropriated in this bill for yard maintenance, and shall charge them to that account, but it is an amendment, as the Chair reads it, that whatever is appropriated under this bill, for whatever purpose appropriated, which actually constitutes a part of yard maintenance, shall be charged to the yard-maintenance account, whether used for yard maintenance or not.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if that is the interpretation of this amendment, it is not in order, for it involves, then, a transfer of appropriation. I understood from the wording of the amendment that it simply directed that all sums of money, under whatever head appropriated, which were actually expended for yard maintenance should appear as such in the accounts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But it does not so read.

Mr. LODGE. The objection to the other amendment, as it seemed to me, was that it did involve a liberty of transferring appropriations; and I thought that was clearly general legislation, because the Secretary has no such power now. If this amendment includes a power to transfer appropriations which are not used for yard maintenance, I am sorry to say that I think the point of order lies.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has read the proviso once. The Chair will read it again:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated—

That manifestly embraces more than yard maintenance.

Mr. LODGE. It embraces all appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It embraces all appropriations—which actually constitute a part of yard maintenance, shall be charged to yard maintenance.

Mr. LODGE. It was that limitation that seemed to me to bring it within the rule. "Actually expended for yard maintenance." Of course, under that language the Secretary could not, for instance, transfer the appropriation for the Marine Corps or for the Philadelphia Home, because they are not used for yard maintenance.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He certainly could.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an appropriation in this bill for the maintenance of yards and docks.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. But it is not half enough. The department is compelled, under the necessities of the condition, to charge to yards and docks money which is appropriated for battleships, making them cost a great deal more than they ought to cost.

Mr. WARREN. Then it is clearly out of order. There is no question about that.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the necessity for this amendment is so apparent that I feel like saying just one word about it.

I have no difference with the Chair regarding his construction of the amendment as now written; but I suggest to the chairman of the committee that if he would change the amendment so as to read:

All sums lawfully used for yard maintenance in yards in which ships are built shall be charged to yard maintenance account—

I think then it would not be subject to the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not the business of the Chair to make suggestions, but the Chair, as at present advised, would hold this amendment in order if it read in this way:

That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated, which do not actually constitute a part of yard maintenance, shall not be charged to the yard-maintenance fund.

It seems to the Chair that would be in order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am inclined to think the language suggested by the Chair would meet the difficulty, but I desire to say to the Senate that the reason for attempting to do this is because we do not appropriate properly. We appropriate a certain sum for yards and docks, and then we take out of "Increase of the Navy" other large sums, and use them for yard maintenance.

The appropriations ought not to be made in that way. The "Increase of the Navy" appropriation ought to be reduced, and a corresponding amount added to the maintenance of yards and docks. That is the proper and direct way of getting at it. Then we should not have this difficulty of false costs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the amendment now stands, the Chair will hold that it is general legislation; that it is not a limitation upon the expenditure of money by the Secretary of the Navy; but it is general legislation suffering and permitting him to pay, at his discretion, all the moneys appropriated in this bill——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before the Chair finishes his ruling. I wish to ask if he will modify the amendment as he suggested and make it in order, because it will accomplish what we are trying to do—prevent bookkeeping from showing things charged to battleships which do not belong there.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if I am in order, I will suggest to the chairman of the committee that the way to meet that difficulty is to enlarge the direct appropriation for yards and docks.

Mr. LODGE. That is the way to do it, of course.

Mr. WARREN. That is regular. The committee have the power to offer such an amendment, and, of course, it would not be out of order.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I simply desire to suggest that it is a most extraordinary thing that the Chair should prepare an amendment to be submitted to the Senate. I have understood that the prerogatives of the Chair were to preside over the Senate, and not to prepare amendments. I object to such an innovation as that on the proceedings of a legislative body.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will sustain the point of order to the amendment as presented.

Mr. O'GORMAN rose.

Mr. LODGE. I now offer, on behalf of the committee——

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that the committee has not finished offering its amendments. As soon as it has done so I will give way to him.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I think the Senator had better offer the amendment himself. I will send the amendment to him. I was simply authorized and directed, by a unanimous vote of the committee, to offer it.

Mr. THORNTON. I wish to say to the Senator that I have not the slightest objection to his offering the amendment, but I did ask him to wait until we got through with these others, and then offer it. I am perfectly willing for him to offer it, but I do not want him to put it in that way, as if I were objecting to his offering it. All I asked in the beginning was that he should wait until we got through with these.

Mr. LODGE. I thought the Senator had concluded, because I saw that the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] was about to offer an amendment. I think, however, the Senator from Louisiana had better offer this amendment. He is acting as chairman, and I think he had better take charge of it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer as a substitute, on behalf of the committee, an amendment to take the place of the one which was just proposed, and to which the point of order was sustained.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after the numerals "$425,000," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated, which are actually expended for yard maintenance, shall be charged to yard maintenance.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I make the same point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, unless there is an appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if that is to be the construction hereafter in appropriating for the various subjects in appropriation bills, we might as well appropriate in a lump sum one hundred and odd millions for the Navy, and let it go at that.

Some years ago an attempt was made in the Senate to have the naval bill subdivided as is the Army bill and as are other appropriation bills. As these bills originate in the House, the best that could be done was to incorporate in the bill certain language calling on the department to estimate in future in the manner that estimates are made for other bills. As a matter of fact, either the department has not so estimated or, if it has so estimated, those erecting the appropriation bill have not paid attention to it, except as to the Marine Corps and the Naval Academy.

One who is familiar with appropriation bills, if he looks through this bill, will find that when he comes to the Marine Corps and the Naval Academy more proper subdivisions are made; the amounts are subdivided so that we can tell where the money goes; but as to the balance of the bill, we start in here with the very first paragraph, as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy shall send to Congress at the beginning of its next regular session a complete schedule or list showing the amount of money of all pay and for all allowances for each grade of officers in the Navy, including retired officers, and for all officers included in this act and for all enlisted men so included.

That language has been in every naval appropriation bill for five or six years, and it has been deliberately ignored every year in building up this bill. As a matter of fact, we find slush funds here, over $40,000,000 in one, and various sums running up to several millions in others; and not satisfied with that, there seems to be a proposition in this amendment offered now to take what has been heretofore in a slight degree subdivided and practically put it into one fund and make it apply throughout the bill.

I have no objection to appropriations of the proper sum for navy yards and docks, but it ought to be done in the regular way. If we are going to have any rule or any law or any order or any knowledge or any economy about appropriations, we ought not to hide them under a bushel, as has been done here year after year as to a part of the naval bill. When, now, the broad proposition comes that we put in the bill an amendment that enables the department to take any amount of money anywhere in the bill that it wants for yards and docks, as I have said, we might just as well strip it and say "$150,000,000," or whatever is necessary, "for the Navy," and let it go at that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the Senator from Wyoming if the real purpose of this amendment, instead of being to promote correct bookkeeping, is not simply to give authority to these people to use funds for this purpose which have been appropriated for one purpose?

Mr. WARREN. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then why not say so?

Mr. WARREN. That is the direct effect of it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It seems to me that, instead of seeking to promote correct bookkeeping, it is to secure authority to divert an appropriation from the purpose named and to use it for another purpose.

Mr. WARREN. It is to give authority to the directing power to take the money and use it as they wish instead as we have intended to appropriate it.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether or not this amendment permits money that has been appropriated for maintenance purposes to be used for maintenance purposes.

Mr. O'GORMAN. It states, in substance, that the money which has been actually expended for yard maintenance shall be charged up to yard maintenance. By an erroneous system which has heretofore prevailed it has appeared that items of expenditure made in connection with yard maintenance have been added to the actual cost of the construction of a ship. There is one instance in the case of the New York, built recently in the Brooklyn Navy Yard. The overhead charge for yard maintenance aggregated more than a million dollars; yet it was charged as a part of the cost of actual construction of the ship, as was stated by the distinguished chairman of the Naval Committee, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], a few days ago.

Unhappily, in years past private shipyard interests in this country have had a sufficient influence respecting the methods of keeping the books of the Navy Department to make it appear that the building of ships by the Government was far more expensive than the building of like ships by private enterprise. The time has now come when that system should be changed and the evil should be eradicated, and it is the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy as well as the judgment of most of the members of the Naval Committee, if not of all, that that system will be changed by the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. WARREN. This proposed amendment simply perpetuates it and makes it lawful to do this. It does not prevent such a practice. It is within the power of the Secretary of the Navy now to cease the operation of such a practice.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator from New York another question, simply for information.

Mr. BRYAN. I will tell the Senator that the Secretary of the Navy appeared before the committee and stated that under the ruling of the comptroller he was unable to charge to the yard maintenance what actually was spent for that purpose, but he was forced under that ruling to charge expenditures upon yard maintenance to the battleships. It was to get away from that ruling that he asked that this amendment be made.

Mr. JONES. This amendment does not permit the Secretary to take a fund appropriated for some particular purpose and use it for maintenance purposes?

Mr. O'GORMAN. It does not under the language used.

Mr. SWANSON. I will explain it.

Mr. JONES. Is there any law now under which he is authorized to use for the purpose money appropriated for some purpose other than maintenance?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Not that I know.

Mr. JONES. It is the purpose of the amendment, I understand, to provide that a fund used for maintenance shall be charged to maintenance.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is correct; and that the fund used for construction shall be charged only to construction.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, here is $7,800,000 appropriated for battleships.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. NELSON. The vice of this amendment is that it is more than a matter of bookkeeping. It practically authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to take out of any appropriation made in the bill and apply it to the maintenance of yards and then make the bookkeeping accordingly. It is throwing the door wide open and giving the Secretary of the Navy power to divert any appropriation, for whatever purpose made, to the maintenance of yards. The amendment goes too far. If you want to limit it to bookkeeping simply, change your amendment into a proper form.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Is it possible that the Senator from Minnesota is directing his remarks to the Senate committee amendment as it appears in the printed bill, or is he keeping in mind the amendment I have offered?

Mr. NELSON. It is the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will ask the Secretary to read that amendment again, and we will see if it is subject to that construction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated for in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated, which are actually expended for yard maintenance shall be charged to yard maintenance.

Mr. NELSON. That is, if it is expended for that purpose it shall be charged to it, but it gives the power to take money out of any appropriation and use it for that purpose. That is the vice of the amendment.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I would not suppose that this language would confer that authority upon the Secretary of the Navy if it is not given to him elsewhere.

Mr. WARREN. There is not any question about it.

Mr. SWANSON. I will explain this particular appropriation. Here is an appropriation made in the bill of $7,800,000 for battleships. The only way by which to draw the pay for that is to draw against that appropriation. If you draw for the maintenance of yards, the comptroller will not honor the warrant. So this will enable the Secretary of the Navy, as the Senator from Minnesota very properly says, to expend a part of the $7,800,000 for maintaining a yard; and if he actually spent it for maintaining the yard, then the warrant will be honored by the comptroller and it will be paid.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that the construction?

Mr. SWANSON. That is the construction to be placed upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this amendment?

Mr. SWANSON. On the amendment. It says, "Any funds that are actually expended for maintenance"; that is, anywhere in the bill. You can not draw it if appropriated for a battleship or appropriated for some other purpose. If he actually spends it in maintaining a yard, then it shall be charged accordingly, and that will be honored. That is the construction I place on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, then, will be compelled to reverse his ruling and sustain the point of order, if that is what the amendment means.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what it means.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. There is not any kind of question about it. The comptroller knows that it means that and nothing else, and it can not mean anything else.

Now, I do not wish to be understood as cramping the Navy or the naval appropriation bill, or embarrassing the Naval Committee; I want to work with them; but for this kind of a practice to creep into our appropriation bill means absolute chaos. It means to leave in the department the entire control. The Secretary can spend $100,000 or $5,000 or $500,000, and charge it up to docks and yards, and we could find out sometime afterwards, perhaps, how much it cost us for docks and yards, but know little of costs or what might be going on meantime. If the Secretary of the Navy has estimated wrongly, or if there is something that has come in since from the comptroller that requires legislation or regulation, and the committee feels that the Secretary is embarrassed, he can send another and later estimate covering the ground, and the committee can put it in proper form by joint resolution or otherwise.

I might say that when we make the appropriation for battleships, and I wish the attention of the Senator from Virginia for a moment, when stating that so many millions shall be appropriated for battleships, we might provide that not exceeding a certain amount or percentage should be used from each such appropriation for yards and docks. But we can not leave things at loose ends all through the bill, so that the entire appropriation can be used as the department may see fit.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will.

Mr. NELSON. I wish to make one suggestion. I think a very brief amendment will accomplish what the Senator intends to accomplish. Let it read:

Provided further, That whatever sums are lawful and properly expended by the Secretary of the Navy for yards and docks shall be charged as such.

That covers it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I will substitute for the word "actually" the word "lawfully," so that it will read:

Provided further, That all expenditures appropriated in this bill, under whatever designation appropriated, which are lawfully expended for yard maintenance shall be charged to yard maintenance.

Is that satisfactory?

Mr. WARREN. That does not cover the point.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Why not?

Mr. WARREN. It does not cover the point because our appropriations are separated under different heads.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wyoming prepare an amendment that he thinks will cover the point?

Mr. WARREN. I am not a member of the committee. I am not working against you. I am not against the proper appropriation being given.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am just after honest bookkeeping; and the Secretary of the Navy states that under the ruling of the comptroller he can not do it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Possibly I am mistaken, but this whole matter is a most amusing one to me. The Secretary of the Navy can ascertain the cost of a battleship. He need not limit himself to book items as to where the matters are charged. He can keep his books according to law. If an appropriation is made for one purpose, it ought to be used for that purpose. If it is not used for that purpose, he is violating the law. So far as ascertaining the cost of a battleship is concerned, the Secretary can take the overhead charges, no matter what is appropriated for that purpose, and proportion those overhead charges to different items of work done in the yards, just as the private yards do. Those yards have repair work and they have ships for individuals and ships for the Government. They have dozens of items, and the work is going on, and they divide and apportion the overhead charges and all the different charges among the different items of work so as to ascertain the actual cost of each one.

The Secretary of the Navy is at perfect liberty, without any of this legislation whatever, to make such a statement as will show the actual and truthful cost of a battleship built in a Government yard. We do not need to change the bookkeeping account and provide that the books shall be properly kept. You need not provide for a juggling of the accounts in order to ascertain the cost of a battleship. You may keep the account according to the act of Congress making the appropriation, but when the Secretary comes to report to Congress or to make a memorandum for his own guidance in the department to determine the cost of a battleship or the cost of repairs on them or any other cost, he can apportion all the expenditures as in his judgment and the judgment of the experts in the department will be just and right and consistent with the facts.

There is no trouble whatever about it that I can see. It is incomprehensible to me that the Secretary of the Navy should come here complaining that he can not ascertain the cost of a battleship unless Congress legislates in respect to how he shall keep his accounts. Let him keep his accounts according to the truth and facts and in accordance with law, and when he comes to determine the cost of a battleship he can apportion the expenditures among the different pieces of work done in that yard in order to ascertain the cost of each.

I do not believe that there is the slightest difficulty in ascertaining truthfully the cost of a battleship without all this legislation here, and it is mischievous legislation, in my judgment, when it comes to a provision of law that Congress can appropriate money according to the estimates of the department for a certain purpose and the Secretary may use it for some other purpose. That is general legislation on this bill, and, in my judgment, it ought not to be allowed.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, it would seem at first blush as though the matter of keeping accounts might be attended to by the Secretary of the Navy without the aid of legislation; but, as has been said by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], owing to a ruling made by the Comptroller of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Navy, in order to accomplish the reform that he has in mind, needs the aid of this legislation.

I have substituted for the word "actually" the word "lawfully" in this amendment, and as amended I can not see any force in any criticism leveled at it, because, in substance, it merely provides that all moneys lawfully expended for yard maintenance shall be charged to yard maintenance. As modified I submit the amendment for the consideration of Senators.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I make the same point of order. I do not see any difference myself.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. WEST. If my idea about the matter is correct, in getting at the cost of a ship, in order to illustrate that with a simple example, there is $30,000,0000 worth of work done in a yard and battleships cost $10,000,000. Then the battleships ought to be charged up with one-third of the $30,000,000 worth of work that is being done in that yard. That would be correct bookkeeping.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the junior Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. O'GORMAN. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. It seems to me the controversy has arisen from a misunderstanding of the purpose. There is no question that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] is correct in his position. The Secretary of the Navy for his own information, or to secure the basis of advice to Congress as to the desirability of building a battleship in a navy yard, can make such a statement as in his judgment the facts warrant. He can make such a distribution of the cost as he thinks the facts warrant. If that was all that was desired, no amendment would be necessary, because he can do that without any authority whatever from Congress.

But I understand that it goes further than that, and what the Secretary wants is a limited authority for the actual distribution of the funds in the building and repair of battleships. If that is desired, of course some additional authority is necessary.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is probably not appropriate for the Chair to inquire what language means, but he has listened for about two months to a discussion of the real meaning of language, and is not philologist enough to determine what it does mean. There seems to have been a statement that the real purpose of this amendment is to enable the Secretary of the Navy to make expenditures from any sum appropriated here, and, if it is lawfully made for yard maintenance, that he shall charge it to yard maintenance, regardless of whether the sum total thereof shall exceed the sum appropriated by Congress for yard maintenance or not.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, if it should exceed the amount appropriated, would it be a lawful expenditure by the Secretary of the Navy?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is coming to that, because the word "lawfully" simply means that from the fund money may be spent for yard maintenance.

Mr. O'GORMAN. However, the word "lawfully" in that connection places a restraint upon the expenditures of the Navy Department. They must be lawful expenditures.

Mr. WARREN. But you make it lawful by saying that he can take it from any fund.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under any designation whatever, the Chair's original ruling assumed that the sole purpose was to keep the amount of yard maintenance up to the amount of the appropriation for yard maintenance. Now, it seems to be the purpose to permit the Secretary of the Navy to expend any sum of money he pleases for yard maintenance out of any particular fund herein provided and to charge it up to yard maintenance. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, before this matter passes from the attention of the Senate, I want to say that the Secretary of the Navy when he entered upon his duties found a system of bookkeeping which he was told had been in long use there under the system in vogue there. He can not find out exactly what a battleship does cost or anything else. Under it battleships are charged with the cost of maintaining the yard and other expenditures which he does not think are just and reasonable. The yards will have to be maintained anyhow, whether the battleships are built in them or not, and it can readily be seen that by such bookkeeping the Government yard is made to appear in a very bad light as compared with private yards in building ships or making repairs or anything else. The committee desired to clarify the bookkeeping in accordance with the Secretary's wishes, and proposed the amendment which went out on the point of order Friday. Our efforts this evening to straighten matters out with that object in view have all failed. I have no fault to find with the rulings of the Chair, for I think he has been right. I have advised the Secretary of the Navy to revise his regulations and give orders for such a system of bookkeeping as he wishes, which will accomplish the purposes he has in view, and if the Comptroller of the Treasury turns him down, to come to Congress and we will try to give him relief.

Mr. THORNTON. I now send up another committee amendment and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, after line 2, insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to make such readjustments as may be necessary to equalize the pay of the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force carried on the rolls of the navy yards and stations with the salaries paid employees of the other Government departments having like duties.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York has been ruled out of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled it out on the ground that it is general legislation.

Mr. REED. Has any business intervened?

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment has been presented just now, but the Chair has not the slightest objection to an appeal being taken from the decision of the Chair, and will grant that right.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, with all respect in the world for the opinion of the Chair, I appeal from the decision. I think, for once, the Chair is mistaken.

Mr. SWANSON. I make the point of order that business has intervened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Chair never proposes to take advantage of that. The Chair will recognize the right of the Senator from Missouri to appeal.

Mr. SWANSON. The Chair might not; but business has intervened.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I was in the Senate; I heard the colloquy; my attention was distracted for an instant by some one speaking to me, and I was utterly surprised when I knew that the point of order had been sustained. I do not think we ought to stand on a technicality of that sort when the Chair is entirely willing to let the Senate pass on the proposition.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is not a question, as I see it, as to what would be pleasing to the Chair; but it is a question of order on which we, of course, expect——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Of course, business has intervened; and if any Senator objects——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I object. I consider the matter finally disposed of, and I raise the point of order.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is therefore not the fault of the Chair that the Senator from Missouri can not now appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have the amendment last submitted again stated.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. I heard the Chair rule this particular question in order. I was called from the Chamber a moment, and no appeal was entered to the ruling of the Chair that the amendment was in order. On my return I heard the colloquy. Of course, if the Senator from Virginia insists upon it, I presume the only way to bring the question up will be upon the floor of the Senate when we are sitting as a Senate, and I give notice now that I shall raise the question at that time. I desire to debate it.

Mr. JONES. I should like to have the amendment that was last sent to the desk again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 22, line 2, after the numerals "$425,000," it is proposed to insert the words:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to make such readjustments as may be necessary to equalize the pay of the clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger force carried on the rolls of the navy yards and stations, with the salaries paid employees of the other Government departments having like duties.

Mr. THORNTON. I will say to the Senator from Washington that it is simply in accordance with the rule of the Senate, and is the same provision that passed the Senate at the last session.

Mr. JONES. It seems to me, Mr. President, that is giving the Secretary of the Navy a power that Congress ought not to give him. If there should be a readjustment, it should be submitted to Congress and Congress should approve it. On the face of it, without further consideration, I am compelled to make the point of order against the amendment that it is general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. THORNTON. On behalf of the committee, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 24, line 16, it is proposed to strike out "$10,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$20,000," so that, if amended, it will read:

Navy Yard, Charleston, S. C.: To complete torpedo-boat berths (to cost not exceeding $300,000), $150,000; dredging, to continue, $20,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. On behalf of the committee, I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 27, line 12, under the head of "Repairs and preservation of navy yards and stations," after the words "navy yards," it is proposed to insert "and Naval Observatory," so that if so amended it will read:

For repairs and preservation at navy yards and Naval Observatory, coaling depots, coaling plants, and stations, $1,100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I now offer the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 28, at the end of line 22, after "$142,000," it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That the expenditure of $40,000 is hereby authorized from the naval hospital fund for such temporary structures and equipment of the naval hospitals at Mare Island and Puget Sound as may be necessary to make especial preparation for the sick of the Navy and visiting fleets at the time of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition and to relieve the present crowded condition of those institutions.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I now offer the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, at the end of line 6, after the words "fiscal year," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That hereafter no officer or enlisted man in active service who shall be absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or other misconduct shall receive pay for the period of such absence, the time so absent and the cause thereof to be ascertained under such procedure and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy: And provided further, That an enlistment shall not be regarded as complete until the enlisted man shall have made good any time in excess of one day lost by unauthorized absences, or on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or other misconduct, or while in confinement awaiting trial or disposition of his case if the trial results in conviction, or while in confinement under sentence.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I thought I was present at all meetings of the committee, but I never heard that amendment read. It is all new to me.

Mr. HUGHES. Unless the Senator from Massachusetts intends to do so, I desire to make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. THORNTON. This amendment was adopted at a meeting held on May 14.

Mr. HUGHES. Certainly it is pretty general legislation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. LODGE. I repeat, I thought I was at every meeting of the committee, though I may not have been. I was at every called meeting.

Mr. THORNTON. I can remember that on at least one occasion—I will not say that it was on the occasion when this amendment was adopted—the Senator from Massachusetts asked to be excused on account of having to attend another committee meeting after he had been at the meeting of the committee for a short while.

Mr. LODGE. I did not leave the committee room on that occasion, and I never heard the amendment before it was read at the desk. However, the point of order having been made and sustained, the amendment is gone.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not desire to delay the Senator in charge of the bill, but I wish to ask a question. In the text of the amendment to which the amendment just ruled out of order was an amendment I notice there is a provision for chaplains, a large additional number of whom are probably necessary. I notice that a certain percentage—10 per cent, I think—are to have the rank of captain in the Navy, which is equal to the rank of colonel in the Army.

Mr. THORNTON. Is the Senator now alluding to the provision as to chaplains?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. THORNTON. We are not on that now.

Mr. WARREN. I am asking the question because we are right at that point now. A certain number of chaplains are to have the relative rank of colonel in the Army, a certain number the rank of lieutenant colonel, a certain number the rank of major, and so forth. Of course in the Army, where a chaplain has charge of many more troops than a chaplain in the Navy, so far as their spiritual well-being is concerned, they have the rank of captain, with the exception that a few chaplains, after very long service, have the rank of major. I should like some little explanation of this provision, as I was absent on business of the Senate the day this amendment was acted on.

Mr. THORNTON. Will the Senator please tell me what he wishes explained? I do not know that I can explain it, but I will do the best I can.

Mr. WARREN. On page 32, just following the place where the last amendment was offered, it is provided:

Hereafter the total number of chaplains and acting chaplains in the Navy shall be 1 to each 1,250 of the total personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps, as fixed by law, including midshipmen, apprentice seamen, and naval prisoners—

I believe that will increase the number from about 24, the present number, to about 49 or 50. Then follows this provision:

And of the total number of chaplains and acting chaplains herein authorized 10 per cent thereof shall have the rank of captain in the Navy, 20 per cent the rank of commander, 20 per cent the rank of lieutenant commander, and the remainder to have the rank of lieutenants and lieutenants (junior grade).

I presume this amendment was drawn by some one interested in an association of clergymen; and it is possible that the word "captain" may mean in their estimation the same thing in the Navy that it does in the Army. In the Navy, however, the highest officer on the biggest battleship afloat, unless he is in command of the fleet, is a captain, and it seems to me that with all the authority and responsibility a captain has and all he had to do to attain the grade of captain, he ought not to have at his side with the same rank the parson who leads in religious devotion those who may be on the ship.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I will say that I was spoken to by a chaplain in the Navy with reference to this particular provision. The number allowed, I think we will all agree, is spread out quite thin enough, 1 chaplain to 1,250 men.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection to the number of chaplains being increased.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. The argument advanced for higher rank, as he put it to me, was that it would give them a more commanding position in the Navy, and that their influence would correspondingly be made more important and valuable in that way. Whether the higher rank carries with it any additional salary I am not prepared to say.

Mr. LODGE. It does not.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts tells me it does not.

Mr. WARREN. I differ from the Senator from Massachusetts as to that; but, allowing that he is right, I do not know of any reason why a chaplain, in order to have greater influence of a spiritual nature over his charge, should have equal rank with the captain of a battleship, the highest rank in the Navy, except that of admiral. This is the trouble, let me say——

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, what rank do the chaplains in the Army have?

Mr. WARREN. A chaplain in the Army has the rank of captain, with the exception that a small percentage, after, I think, 30 years' service, have the rank of major. This provision gives chaplains in the Navy the relative rank of colonel, lieutenant colonel, and major in the Army; that is, 10 per cent are to have the relative rank of colonel, 20 per cent are to have the relative rank of lieutenant colonel, and 20 per cent are to have the relative rank of major.

I do not see any reason for this, and I want to say what the result will probably be: In the Navy there has been a rule since long before any of us, perhaps, can remember that whatever advantages the Army had the Navy should also have. That being true—and in most matters it is made so by statute—the Army, on the other hand, naturally demands that it shall have what the Navy has. I see no necessity for having chaplains in the Navy with higher grade than chaplains in the Army. I do not see any reason why we should be called upon almost immediately to raise the rank of chaplains in the Army and Navy. It has been a very satisfactory service heretofore, if we may judge from the number of applicants we have for the position. I know that I have had, during my service in the Senate, hundreds of applications, and, although whatever it may be in the Navy, in the Army the position seems to be in an appointive way a perquisite of the President. I do not know of any President who has asked that the rank should be increased. I do know, however, that in the medical branch, in the dentistry branch, and in the veterinary branch the officers connected therewith are always trying to get higher rank; and it has been the duty of the Committee on Military Affairs, so far as the Army is concerned, and of the Committee on Naval Affairs for the Navy, to hold the ranks level with one another according to the degree of responsibility. I dislike to see a position of this kind taken that is going to result in raising the rank of chaplains of the Navy above the rank held by chaplains in the Army. If it means no increase in salary, certainly there is no reason for it; and if it does mean an increase in salary, there is certainly no reason why chaplains in the Navy should receive greater rank than those in the Army. I understand the amendment was agreed to while I was absent by detail of the Senate, but I sincerely hope that it may be corrected in conference.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, in 1842 there were 24 chaplains created for the Navy.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator allow me to say that I do not object to increasing the number at all?

Mr. LODGE. In 1842 there were 24 chaplains created for the Navy. There were then 1,554 officers and 12,000 enlisted men. Now the number has grown to 3,600 officers and 61,000 men. The chaplains are absolutely inadequate for the service of the American Navy to-day. All the churches of the country, without exception, have united in asking for this increase in the number of chaplains, and it has been given, I think, in a very moderate way. They are to be added at the rate of only seven a year, and their number is to be increased until a limit of one for every 1,250 men is reached. I do not think the Senate can possibly disagree to the need of more chaplains in the Navy. The work they do is extremely valuable from every point of view.

When the personnel act was passed the chaplains were excepted specifically by name from the longevity pay increase which that act carried. They do not receive as much pay as the doctors and paymasters of similar relative rank, and that remains unchanged by this amendment.

As to the question of rank, doctors in the Navy can have relative rank as high as admiral; so can paymasters; and under this provision 10 chaplains are to have relative rank as high as captain in the Navy. Chaplains with that rank will not be sent to sea; there will be no conflict of rank; they will only have relative rank; but it does give them a certain recognition for long years of service.

If we give relative rank to staff officers, which has been the settled policy of the Navy for many years, I do not see why chaplains should not have at the end of many years' service relative rank as high as captain, which only 10 can receive. We have not raised the pay of chaplains; we have not given them the pay which other officers of the staff with relative rank receive. I have here somewhere the exact differences, which are perhaps worth looking at. They get $550 less when they get to be lieutenant commanders than a doctor or paymaster of the same grade; and that we have not raised. We have not increased their pay. I think we ought to have increased their pay, but we have not done it in this amendment. All we have done is to give, by very slow degrees, the number of chaplains which the Navy ought to have.

It is impossible for 24 chaplains to do the work of the United States Navy to-day. That number was based on a force of 14,000 men, all told. Now there are 61,000 men, and officers in proportion, as I have said—65,000 in round numbers.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Not enough to conduct the burial service.

Mr. LODGE. Why, no. There are not enough to put on the battleships that go to sea. There are not enough to be in the hospitals and in the navy yards of this country. It is utterly impossible for them to do it.

I think this is one of the best amendments that has been put into any naval bill. It was put in by the House committee and went out under their rule on a point of order. The point of order will not lie against the amendment here, because it is not general legislation. We have increased the Marine Corps here. We have increased other divisions here. It is a change of existing law, which is the House rule, but that is not our rule. Our rule is general legislation. This is simply increasing the numbers of a particular branch of the service, which has been done here repeatedly.

I think it would be a very great misfortune if this amendment should be lost. It was really agreed to by the House. It went out there only on a point of order. If it goes into conference it will be accepted. We have taken the House provision in our amendment. When you think of the relative rank that is given to doctors, paymasters, and civil engineers, I do not see any reason for refusing it to the chaplains.

Mr. WARREN obtained the floor.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wyoming permit me now to answer the question he asked me some time ago?

Mr. WARREN. I shall occupy the floor only for a moment. There is no objection that I know of as to the number of chaplains. I think it is a very just and very worthy measure; but a comparison of the chaplains as to their rank with the officers of the Medical Service and the Engineers fails when you consider that in the medical line, for instance, the medical officers that arrive at the rank which is proposed here do so not only at the end of long and arduous service, but when they have charge of great divisions, when they have hundreds of doctors under them, when they have a great amount of responsibility and property in the way of stores of medicines, and so forth, in their charge. It is the same way with engineers and other officers. In the service of the chaplains, however, there is no routine of office now, and I know of none that can be imposed, where one officer has charge of great properties and the direction of a great number of men under him.

These chaplains, as I understand, are sent on different warships and to the different navy yards, and it seems to me worse to give them the rank and not the pay than it would to give them the pay and less rank. I see no good reason why the highest rank in the Navy should be given to some chaplain who, as the Senator says, probably will not go to sea. I will admit that it makes a nice, soft place for some man who may have done good service, but I believe he would prefer to have less rank and more pay, to which I certainly should not object.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, there are many of them who do go to sea. I have in my mind now one who has just returned from Vera Cruz. I am simply answering the particular point the Senator made, that they do not go to sea. I know he is mistaken in that particular statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The Senator knows that they desire to go.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I know that they desire to go and do go.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Wyoming asked me some time ago if I could give the reasons that actuated the committee in creating the grade of captain for the chaplains. I have not had the opportunity to reply until now. I wish to say to him frankly that I do not know, because I was not present at the time the amendment was carried, being detained by request of the Secretary of Commerce on what was considered an important matter of business. Therefore I do not know of my own knowledge; but other members of the committee who were present will no doubt be able to explain the matter to the Senator's satisfaction; at least, I hope so.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I understand the Navy now confers the rank of captain on certain chaplains. This does not increase the pro rata number of those that can be captains, as I understand. The chaplains can not get pay exceeding that of junior commander. That is the limit of their pay. They already have the rank of captain in the Army. A chaplain in the Navy can not be higher than a major, as I understand. We do not change the law permitting them to have the rank of captain.

There is great necessity for this increase. There are only 8 battleships that are able to have chaplains now. Of the 24 chaplains that we now have, only 8 could be provided for battleships.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will understand that there is no objection to the increase of the number.

Mr. SWANSON. There has been no change in the rank given them. We do not change the law in that respect.

Mr. WARREN. Why do you insert it here, then?

Mr. SWANSON. We keep up the same pro rata—10 per cent of them.

Mr. WARREN. Why do you insert it here, if it is already the law?

Mr. SWANSON. The law is that a certain pro rata of them are captains now, as I understand.

Mr. WARREN. I have not seen that law.

Mr. SWANSON. We keep up the same proportionate number. They are entitled to the rank but not to the pay of captain, as I understand, under the present law.

Mr. LODGE. They are not entitled to the pay of captain; but they have now the relative rank of major, I know, and I think some of them have the relative rank of captain. I do not think we give them any more rank or pay than they now have.

Mr. SWANSON. None of them.

Mr. WARREN. I should be glad to have the Senator produce the law, for I may be wrong about it.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I have here a list of chaplains in the Navy. There are five who have the relative rank of captain.

Mr. LODGE. I felt sure of that.

Mr. WEEKS. There are 7 who have the relative rank of commander. There are 5 who have the relative rank of lieutenant commander. There is 1 who has the relative rank of lieutenant. The remainder of the 24 have the relative rank of lieutenant, junior grade.

Mr. LODGE. Has the Senator the statute there?

Mr. WEEKS. I have not the statute. I have the Navy Register.

Mr. LODGE. The Navy Register certainly would not be contrary to the statute. I know they have the relative rank of major.

Mr. WEEKS. Under the provision which is offered here, the proportional number of chaplains of the relative rank of captain would be less than in the present establishment.

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. WEEKS. And the proportional number having the relative rank of commander would be less than in the present establishment, so that in reality the average rank of chaplains in the Navy will be lower than it is at present.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the Senator will find the law to be the act of June 29, 1906, found in the Navy Yearbook, at page 515, in which the pay and the increase in grades were fixed. This provision simply carries out, with the increase, the existing law with the present 24 chaplains, as I understand.

Mr. WARREN. Then, as I understand, this is really a limit on the present law? Is that the ground the Senator takes?

Mr. SWANSON. It is not a limit. It does not change the existing law as to the number.

Mr. WARREN. But as to the percentage?

Mr. SWANSON. As to the percentage; that is all.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator will understand that I made no point of order. In fact, I could not do so, because the amendment was agreed to the other day. I did want this explanation, however, and I wanted it in the RECORD, because of what I have stated—the comity between the two branches of our fighting forces, each one jealous of its own. I wanted to meet the statement as to why that provision has been inserted here, what it means, and what it amounts to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] or the Senator in charge of the bill [Mr. THORNTON] with reference to this provision, as it has been discussed.

I received a telegram to-day very strongly objecting, as I understand, to this provision of the bill. I understand, also, that it was adopted a day or two ago in Committee of the Whole. I wish to ask what change, if any, from the existing law this provision makes in the method of selecting the chaplains?

Mr. LODGE. It makes no difference.

Mr. JONES. The plan of selecting them will be just the same as we have been following and are following now?

Mr. LODGE. They will be appointed in the same way.

Mr. JONES. By the same kind of board and with the same examinations as now?

Mr. LODGE. Precisely. That is all provided for in the amendment—their examinations and everything. The grade of acting chaplain is created.

Mr. JONES. I know that is provided in the amendment; but I wish to know whether the provision in the amendment is the same as we have been following in the past in selecting chaplains?

Mr. LODGE. Except that now chaplains appointed to the Navy from civil life, as they all are appointed now, are not appointed acting chaplains. They are given at once the grade of junior lieutenant.

Mr. JONES. What is the difference between the method provided in this amendment for the selection of chaplains in the Navy and the method pursued heretofore?

Mr. LODGE. None.

Mr. JONES. None at all?

Mr. LODGE. None at all, except the interposition of this grade of acting chaplain, which lasts three years after they first enter. Then they get their regular commission and their rank.

Mr. JONES. So that the only substantial part of this amendment is that it increases the number of chaplains?

Mr. LODGE. That is all.

Mr. JONES. I must confess that I can not see any especial objection to that, or any basis for the telegram I have received.

Mr. THORNTON. I now send up another committee amendment, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, at the end of line 6, it is proposed to insert:

That the act approved August 22, 1912, making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes, in so far as it relates to the payment of six months' pay to the widow of an officer or enlisted man, etc., be amended to read as follows:

"That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death, from wounds or disease not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Navy and Marine Corps, the Paymaster General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and, if no widow, to the children, and, if there be no children, to any other dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death, exclusive of any expenses of interment which the Government defrays under existing law."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, is it intended by that amendment to have six months' pay added to the funeral expenses?

Mr. THORNTON. Six months' pay exclusive of interment expenses; six months' pay to the widow or children of anyone who dies in the service, unless it was on account of his own misconduct.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I understand. I wish to say that that is very much like what is already provided in the Army and Navy, except that in the Army an amount paid by the Government for burial expenses is deducted, and I think this should be the same, so that they will rest alike. In one case the family pays the expenses, and in another the death occurs so far away that the expenses are paid by the Government. I think it should be inclusive of that, instead of exclusive.

Mr. THORNTON. I will say to the Senator that I was not aware exactly what the rule was in the case of enlisted men in the Army. All I know is that this was the recommendation sent down by the Navy Department, requesting that it be offered as an amendment, and I was instructed by the committee to offer it as a committee amendment.

Mr. WARREN. Would the Senator mind letting it lie over while we proceed to other amendments, until I can find the provision of existing law?

Mr. THORNTON. I will ask that the amendment may be temporarily laid aside.

I wish to say that as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is compelled to leave the Chamber shortly, I will request him to now offer the amendment he was requested by the committee to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, at the end of the bill, the following:

The President may, in his discretion, direct the sale, in such manner, at such price, and upon such terms as he shall deem proper, of the battleships Idaho and Mississippi. All moneys received from the sale of said vessels shall, after payment therefrom of the expenses of such sale, be deposited by the Secretary of the Navy in the Treasury, and shall, until expended, be available for the construction of such other vessel or vessels, at least equal for purposes of offense and defense to the most modern vessels of the same class now projected here or abroad, as the President may in his discretion authorize: Provided, That no vessel shall be sold, exchanged, or conveyed under this authorization unless such sale, exchange, or conveyance, or the agreement therefor, shall have been made prior to July 1, 1915: Provided further, That any vessel or vessels constructed from the money received from the sale of the Mississippi and Idaho shall not be included in the annual appropriations for the increase of the Navy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire from the chairman or some member of the committee when these vessels were constructed.

Mr. LODGE. I was about to state the facts in that regard. The construction of these vessels was authorized in 1905, and they were completed in 1908. They are first-rate vessels of their type.

Mr. THOMAS. Why should they be sold?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator's question anticipates what I was about to say.

Mr. THOMAS. I beg the Senator's pardon for interrupting him unnecessarily.

Mr. LODGE. The President and the Secretary of the Navy recommend this sale because an offer has been made, or they understand an offer is to be made, for their purchase by a European Government. They think it will be of advantage to sell these two vessels, if they can be sold for cost or more, and build one vessel in their place.

These two vessels are of 13,000 tons each. Those which we are at present building are of 30,000 tons each. The Navy Department thinks it would be a very good arrangement for us to exchange these two vessels for one vessel of the larger type. They expect to realize enough from them to build one vessel like battleship No. 39 now laid down in the New York yard. They will not sell otherwise.

If the vessels are not sold, there is no loss to the Navy of the United States. They are fine vessels. The only objection is that they are of 13,000 tons apiece, while the most recent types constructed to-day are more than twice as large.

Mr. THOMAS. I quite agree that the opportunity for selling these ships will probably be taken advantage of, but the fact is that these two vessels of 13,000 tons each were completed in 1908, which was probably the extreme dimension of ships at the time their keels were laid, and now they are practically of no value to our Navy.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, that is not correct. They are valuable ships. Capt. Winterhalter, who appeared before the committee with the Secretary of the Navy in regard to it, told me that they were first-rate vessels and that there was no objection at all to our keeping them.

Mr. THOMAS. They are not valuable.

Mr. LODGE. They are very valuable.

Mr. THOMAS. They are not valuable as against vessels of 30,000 tons.

Mr. LODGE. No; one of them is not.

Mr. THOMAS. Neither of them, I presume.

Mr. LODGE. That is not so certain.

Mr. THOMAS. But by 1920 we will be selling our 30,000-ton vessels, for the reason that in this race for naval construction they will be building them at a cost of forty or fifty million dollars each and in all probability having a tonnage of 50,000 or 60,000. It is a good illustration of the progress which the nations are making in their competition in boat building that will inevitably lead all the nations of the earth to bankruptcy.

Mr. LANE. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Colorado that in 1920 we will be buying the ships back, for the reason that they will be smaller targets for the bombs thrown from airships, and smaller ships will be valuable.

Mr. THOMAS. We will not be buying them back unless the Armor Trust and the War Trust in the meantime disappear, and I see no signs of that. We will keep building them as long as those trusts can keep the Nation apprehensive as to the hostile designs of its neighbors.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 47, after line 17, insert:

Hereafter in addition to the appointments of midshipmen to the United States Naval Academy as now prescribed by law, the Secretary of the Navy is allowed 15 appointments annually from the enlisted men of the Navy who are citizens of the United States and not more than 20 years of age on the date of entrance to the Naval Academy and who shall have served not less than one year as enlisted men on the date of entrance: Provided, That such appointments shall be made in the order of merit from candidates who have passed such physical and such competitive mental examinations as the Secretary of the Navy shall prescribe; and candidates so selected shall then be required to pass the physical and mental examinations now required by law for entrance to the Naval Academy.

Mr. THORNTON. Mr. President, I desire to say that this is the same amendment, except a change as to the number to be appointed and the time of service, that was ruled out on a point of order last Wednesday raised by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. The Senator from Massachusetts, however, is perfectly willing that the amendment in its present shape shall be adopted.

Mr. LODGE. A point of order was made by my colleague, the junior Senator. Is the age changed?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; from 22 to 20.

Mr. THORNTON. I will say to the Senator that it was submitted to his colleague.

Mr. LODGE. I did not hear that part of the Senator's statement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I now send up the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 37, after line 17, after the numerals "$9,788,000," insert the following proviso:

"Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy be authorized at his discretion to issue free of cost the national flag, United States national ensign No. 7, used for draping the coffin of any officer or enlisted man of the Navy or Marine Corps whose death occurs while in the service of the United States Navy or Marine Corps, upon request, to the relatives of the deceased officer or enlisted man or, upon request, to a school, patriotic order, or society to which the deceased officer or man belonged.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. Also add the word "further," after "Provided," in the bill at that point.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I send up the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, line 2, strike out the word "steam" before the word "machinery," so that, if amended, it will read:

Construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THORNTON. I now send up the following amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 13, insert as a separate paragraph:

A committee is hereby authorized to be appointed, to consist of one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate and one member of the Committee on Naval Affairs of the House of Representatives, to be selected by the chairmen of the respective committees, and one naval officer, to be selected by the Secretary of the Navy, to investigate and report at the next regular session of Congress upon the selection of a suitable site for the erection of an armor plant to enable the United States to manufacture its own armor plate and special-treatment steel capable of standing all ballistic and other necessary tests required for use in vessels of the Navy at the lowest possible cost to the Government, taking into consideration all of the elements necessary for the economical and successful operation of such a plant, such as the availability of labor, material, and fuel, and transportation facilities to and from said plant. Said report shall contain the cost of a site sufficient to accommodate a plant having an annual output capacity of 20,000 tons and a site for an output of 10,000 tons, and also an itemized statement of the cost of the necessary buildings, machinery, and accessories for each, and the annual cost and maintenance of each, and the estimated cost of the finished product.

Said committee is authorized to sit during the recess of Congress, to send for persons and papers, and to administer oaths.

The sum of $5,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of said committee and to be immediately available.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few days ago, when a somewhat similar amendment was offered, the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] made a point of order against it. I will ask the Senator who has offered the amendment if that Senator had any information that this amendment would be offered?

Mr. THORNTON. The only information I have on the subject is that the department thought that, drawn in this way, it would cover the objections made by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and that in this shape it would not be subject to the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would make the point of no quorum, and I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will come in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Kenyon	Page	Sterling
Bristow	Kern	Perkins	Stone
Bryan	La Follette	Ransdell	Swanson
Catron	Lane	Saulsbury	Thomas

Hughes	Nelson	Smith, Md.
James	Norris	Smith, Mich.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] is detained from the Senate on account of sickness in his family. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. My colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is unavoidably absent from the Senate.

Mr. THORNTON. I announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and will state that he is paired with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the remainder of the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absentees.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, June 2, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 1, 1914.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, infinite Spirit, for that law of our being which takes us at times away from the busy whirl and turmoil of life's activities and brings us to Thee in prayer, where forgetting the conventionalities of society, commercial values, party strife, and religious differences we may lift our hearts to Thee in love and gratitude for past favors, confessing our sins, imploring Thy mercy and Thy guidance in all the duties of life.

Open Thou the crystal fountain,
Whence the living waters flow;
Let the fiery cloudy pillar
Lead us all the journey through;
Strong Deliverer!
Be Thou still our strength and shield.

In His name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, May 29, 1914, was read and approved.

ADDRESSES AT ARLINGTON.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD speeches delivered by the honorable Speaker of this House, the President of the United States, and Senator SMOOT at Arlington Cemetery on Decoration Day, May 30.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD speeches made by the President, Senator SMOOT, and the Speaker at Arlington. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I would suggest to the gentleman he have printed the introductory speeches, also, of the different speakers.

Mr. COX. I will put them in if I can get them. I think they are in the Post.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. GRIEST, until such time as his physician consents to a renewal of active duties.

To Mr. STEPHENS of California, for six days, on account of duties connected with the Board of Visitors, United States Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

MIGRATORY BIRD LAW.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a decision of Judge Trieber, of the United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas, rendered on Saturday, upon the constitutionality of the migratory bird law.

Mr. COX. How does he hold?

Mr. BARTLETT. That it is unconstitutional.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to print a decision by Judge Trieber in reference to the migratory bird law.

Mr. BARTLETT. In which the law was held to be unconstitutional.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call the attention of the House to the fact that the notice of the Lindsey meeting last week is incorrect as published in last Friday's RECORD, relating to the meeting held in the matter of the coal strike. Can that be corrected?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman's statement corrects it.

The SPEAKER. All the gentleman can do is to make a statement in contradiction of it; the gentleman can not correct the text of the article. Neither the gentleman has the right, the House, nor the whole Congress.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I would say that this meeting which was held was a Socialist meeting, and——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order, and the regular order is to go into committee.

COMMISSION ON NATIONAL AID TO VOCATIONAL EDUCATION.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I would ask the gentleman to withhold his demand for the regular order for a moment. The Commission on Vocational Education wish to make their report, and the time is limited.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to that, but I do not think we ought to have this coal strike discussed at this time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I do, in order that the gentleman from Georgia may make his report.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, the Commission on National Aid to Vocational Education was created by an act approved January 24, 1914, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint a commission of nine members to consider the subject of national aid to vocational education and report their findings and recommendations not later than June 1. This commission, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, was composed of four congressional members and five noncongressional members. This general committee has been in session for two months, almost every day. The subcommittee composed of noncongressional members were in session not only all day but frequently at night. Too much credit, Mr. Speaker, can not be given to the noncongressional subcommittee——

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman intend to prefer a request?

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. If the gentleman will wait a few minutes, I just wish to make these preliminary remarks.

Mr. MANN. I am not willing to wait unless I know what is coming.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. It will be all through in half a second.

Mr. MANN. It will be; that is true.

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. Does the gentleman object. I hope he will not.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Georgia any request?

Mr. HUGHES of Georgia. I wanted to say this much: This committee is ready to make their report and submit it. They are not asking for an extension of time nor are they asking for an increase of appropriation. We are ready to make and do make this report within the time specified, and, Mr. Speaker, it is most pleasing to the commission to state that we propose to turn into the Treasury of the United States several thousand dollars of the $15,000 of the appropriation. [Applause.] Now, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I propose to submit on behalf of the commission the report and bill. I do not ask to have it read, because it is too voluminous.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman submits a report from the commission. That report goes through the basket.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure, but I suppose the report should be referred to a committee.

The SPEAKER. The report and bill will be referred to a regular committee.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what committee it goes to.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will refer it properly.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

ANTITRUST LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is that the House resolve itself automatically into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills embraced within the special rule. In the absence of Mr. HULL, the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 15657 and other bills embraced within the special rule, with Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15657) to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to section 7.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, there is one amendment now pending, offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] immediately before the committee rose on Friday last. Shall we not have to vote first on that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary has an amendment in addition to that offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if we have to dispose of the first paragraph before we take up the second paragraph of that section, I suggest that the gentleman from North Carolina ask unanimous consent that the first paragraph of the section be taken up before the second paragraph, and that they be considered separately; that the two paragraphs be considered as entirely separate.

Mr. WEBB. My idea was, Mr. Chairman, to let all amendments to the section be disposed of, as has been the practice in the past.

Mr. MANN. It is immaterial to me. I thought perhaps the gentleman would like to take up the labor proposition first.

Mr. WEBB. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments to the first paragraph of section 7 be disposed of before we take up the second paragraph of that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the first paragraph of section 7 be first considered. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, there is one amendment pending. To which paragraph is that intended to apply?

Mr. WEBB. To the second paragraph.

Mr. MURDOCK. And the amendment which the gentleman from North Carolina offered is to the first paragraph?

Mr. WEBB. Yes; to the first paragraph of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 24, at the end of line 10, amend by striking out the period and inserting a semicolon and by adding the following: "Nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 7 down to and including the word "thereof," in line 10, and insert the following: "The provisions of the antitrust laws shall not apply to agricultural, labor, consumers, fraternal, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations."

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WEBB. That is, to know whether the amendment just presented by the gentleman from Kentucky is in order. From its construction it seems to be an amendment to an amendment to an amendment. I make a point of order on it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, anyhow, just to preserve the record straight and conform to the rules of the House. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, we have treated the existing committee bill, which is an amendment in itself, as though it were an original bill, and all through the discussion and consideration so far we have allowed amendments to amendments to the committee amendment, although I think that was a little irregular; but nobody has said anything about it, because it is usual when you bring in such a thing to treat a committee substitute as though it were an original bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. The committee substitute is the one which was reported under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be in keeping with the rule in Committee of the Whole, to permit an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. MANN. But this is not an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it should not be treated as an amendment. Does the gentleman from North Carolina insist on his point of order?

Mr. WEBB. I withdraw it. We are going to have a vote on it anyhow.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee, I think I have the privilege of offering an amendment before the other gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. NELSON. I offer it as a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "profit" and before the words "or to forbid," in line 8, page 24, the following: "Or of cooperative associations formed by farmers for the purpose of buying more cheaply and of marketing their products to better advantage," so as to make the first paragraph of this section read: "That nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of fraternal, labor, consumers', agricultural, or horticultural organizations, orders, or associations instituted for the purposes of mutual help, and not having capital stock, or conducted for profit; or of cooperative associations formed by farmers for the purpose of buying more cheaply and marketing their products to better advantage; or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations, orders, or associations from carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to make a point of order that that is not a substitute, on the face of it. We shall get all confused and mixed up in this section unless we treat the amendments as separate amendments.

Mr. MURDOCK. Let us have them all offered as amendments.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Wisconsin will have the opportunity to offer the amendment that he desires to offer at the proper time, without question.

Mr. NELSON. I have no objection to taking them up in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is an amendment and substitute pending now.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, my understanding was that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] offered his amendment for the purpose of allowing all gentlemen to offer amendments thereto at this time for purposes of information and to have them considered as pending.

Mr. MANN. He can not do that. I made the point of order before that the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky was not an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina. It plainly is not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order raised by the gentleman is well taken.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me inquire of the chairman if the gentleman does not think the reading of so many amendments would tend to confuse rather than to help us?

I can not hold in my head five or six different amendments, all relating to different phases of the subject.

Mr. MURDOCK. They will be reported before we come to vote on them.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Oklahoma realizes that we ought to get a limit of debate, if possible, on this paragraph. Now, the object of the chairman of the committee, as I understand it, is to have all amendments offered at this time for information, and as the different amendments are discussed, they will be reported from the desk, and the committee in that way will be able to understand the merits of each one of the amendments.

Mr. FERRIS. The trouble about that is that we do not have the amendments printed, and we will have to go to the desk to see what they are, and it will be confusing.

Mr. MANN. I shall have to make a point of order against the offering of these amendments in this way. Nobody will know where we are in a few minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. What is now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] are pending.

Mr. MANN. What became of the point of order which I made on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky that it was not an amendment to the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky offers it as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but I make the point of order that it is not a substitute. It is offered to a different part of the section. They have no relation to each other.

Mr. THOMAS. It is offered to the first part of the section. It is either a substitute or a separate amendment to the first paragraph of the section.

Mr. MANN. That would be in order; but the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] comes in at the end of the paragraph, and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky comes in at the beginning of the paragraph. They might both be agreed to by the committee. One is not a substitute for the other in any sense.

Mr. GARNER. It makes no difference, just so you get a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. THOMAS. I will say this much, may it please the Chair, that the amendment or the substitute, as the case may be, which I have offered, is to the first paragraph of section 7. I understand that the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] is to the last part of this paragraph. That is what I understood the gentleman from Illinois to claim.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina is to add something at the end of the paragraph.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky is practically to change the language of the paragraph. Now, Mr. Chairman, if it is to be held as an amendment to the amendment, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky is agreed to, there will be no chance of getting a vote upon the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina; and although the committee might want to agree to both amendments, it could not possibly do it, if it is held to be an amendment to the amendment, because it would not be in order, I take it, to offer this amendment over again after we had substituted something for it.

Mr. HENRY. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that he offer his amendment later.

Mr. MANN. The amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky will be in order after the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. My amendment is certainly an amendment to the first part of the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Oh, undoubtedly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that, strictly speaking, the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] should be considered as an amendment to perfect the text of the bill. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky strikes out the paragraph and proposes to insert new matter. For that reason the Chair feels constrained to sustain the point of order. Of course, the gentleman from Kentucky will have an opportunity to offer his amendment later. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. THOMAS. When shall I have an opportunity of offering my amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. As soon as this amendment is disposed of and the gentleman is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS. Suppose the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is adopted.

Mr. GARNER. Then the gentleman from Kentucky can offer his.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Kentucky that his amendment will be in order as soon as the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is disposed of.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Chair hold that I may offer it as an amendment or as a substitute?

Mr. GARNER. When the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina is disposed of the gentleman from Kentucky can offer his proposition as an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, I apprehend there will be some desire to discuss the amendments offered to the first paragraph of section 7, and I want to know from my friend from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] if we may get some understanding as to the amount of time to be consumed on amendments to the first part of the section, and to the entire section?

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman from North Carolina want on his amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I should think we can dispose of it in 35 or 40 minutes on our side.

Mr. MANN. Do you want that much time on this amendment?

Mr. HENRY. I should like to have 15 minutes on this particular amendment myself.

Mr. WEBB. I make this request, that we devote two hours to the discussion of the amendments to this entire section, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD] and the other hour to be controlled by myself.

Mr. MANN. Would it not be better to dispose of these amendments one at a time?

Mr. MURDOCK. And fix a time limit on each separate amendment.

Mr. WEBB. I think that would be more orderly, but I should like to have some understanding as to the time on the entire section.

Mr. MANN. We will try to reach an equitable understanding about that. I will say to the gentleman there is no desire to take up a great deal of time.

Mr. WEBB. How much time is desired on these amendments?

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman means on his amendment. There will be some discussion desired on the Thomas amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. I want some time on my amendment, Mr. Chairman. I am going to offer that amendment to the whole paragraph.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want 10 minutes on the Webb amendment.

Mr. MANN. How much time does the gentleman from North Carolina want on his amendment?

Mr. WEBB. I think we can dispose of it in 45 minutes on our side.

Mr. HENRY. It is understood that I shall have 15 minutes, is it not?

Mr. MANN. Very well; make it 45 minutes on a side. It is possible we may not use all the time on this side on this amendment, but we want time on the other amendments.

Mr. WEBB. Very well. You shall have that. I agree to that.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. WEBB. I ask unanimous consent that on the amendment proposed by the committee, which I have just sent to the Clerk's desk, the debate be closed in 90 minutes, 45 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Minnesota and 45 minutes to be controlled by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment be closed in 1 hour and 30 minutes, one half to be controlled by himself and the other half by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD]. Is there objection?

Mr. QUIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to have both amendments reported.

The CHAIRMAN. There is only one amendment pending.

Mr. QUIN. I would like to have that reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. HOWARD. I make the point of order that it is too late to object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not; the gentleman from Kentucky was on his feet.

Mr. THOMAS. I would like unanimous consent for five minutes on this amendment myself.

Mr. WEBB. I will give the gentleman four or five minutes.

Mr. THOMAS. I want five, not "four or five" minutes. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which is under consideration is, in the opinion of the committee, in keeping with the declaration of the Democratic platform—to the effect that labor organizations and farmers' organizations organized for mutual help shall not be considered or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

It is needless to say that we have had much diversity of opinion in adopting and agreeing on this particular section, but after all, Mr. Chairman, we have embodied in this amendment what we understand to be the best legal interpretation of the best judges in the United States. Personally I have never had any idea that the existence and operation of labor organizations, of farmers' unions, or fraternal orders were ever intended to come within the provisions of the antitrust law. However, some labor leaders have contended for many years that labor organizations have their existence as a matter of sufferance and at the whim of the Attorney General, and if suit should be brought, if they were not dissolved entirely, much trouble could be given them. We are therefore writing into the statutes of the United States the concensus of opinion of the best judges of the country on this troublesome question. I have not had an opportunity of reading the opinion, but only last Friday the circuit court of appeals of the fourth circuit at Richmond, Va., held that a labor organization was not a conspiracy or combination in restraint of trade. Therefore we say that we have embodied in this section as set forth in the first part of section 7 and as expressed in the latter part of this amendment which I now offer what is generally understood to be the law and should be the law in the United States with reference to labor organizations, as well as fraternal and farmers' organizations. [Applause.]

I now yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, there has been so much controversy about what was intended when the original Sherman antitrust law was passed that I think we should make clear just what we intend by this law. Some of us did not believe section 7 as originally written by the Committee on the Judiciary expressed exactly what should be in this bill. Therefore we took exception to the language of the first part of the paragraph in section 7 and insisted there should be additional language. Among those who agreed that the language was not plain enough were the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. KITCHIN, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HINEBAUGH, the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. GRAHAM, the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. TOWNER, the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. LEWIS, and myself. We met to confer, and concluded that we ought to make the language more explicit. In that conference held in the committee room of the Committee on Rules, on the evening of May 21, 1914, we agreed that this language should be added at the end of the first paragraph of section 7, to wit, after the word "thereof":

Nor shall such organizations, orders, or associations or the members thereof be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws.

This language I have read is exactly the verbiage used by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] in the amendment offered by him and is the amendment agreed upon by Mr. KITCHIN and our conferees in my office. The Committee on the Judiciary courteously accepted the language as prepared by the gentlemen in the conference, believing, I assume, that we were correct and that the original language used by them was not quite explicit. So we came to a satisfactory agreement with the House Judiciary Committee about this addition to the first part of section 7, and, as far as I am concerned, we are standing squarely with the committee for that paragraph with our added language. We called into the conference with us the heads of the American Federation of Labor, and submitted this amendment to them, and said to them that we believed its adoption as an addition to section 7 would clearly exempt labor organizations and farmers' organizations from the provisions of the antitrust laws.

They agreed with us; they called their counsel into conference with them and with us, and we all concurred that this amendment added to the paragraph of section 7 would give these organizations what they have desired so long, and all they have been struggling for since the original enactment of the Sherman antitrust law.

In my judgment, when Congress was dealing with "combinations in restraint of trade" it never intended that the law should apply to labor organizations or farmers' organizations without capital and not for profit. The courts took a different view of it and construed the act as it was never intended that it should be interpreted. The time has come when we can correct that error and write the language in the law as those gentlemen insist that it should be and should have been.

I am glad of the opportunity of espousing their cause to-day and standing with them in accord and agreement. The Judiciary Committee has acceded to their position to the extent indicated by me, and so has the President. This is entirely a satisfactory solution of the question. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, unfortunately there are many men in this country who hesitate to espouse the cause of organized labor or the farmers for fear they will be called "demagogues." That has kept many a man from advocating on the floor of this House what he believed in his heart, because he dreaded adverse criticism. We have come up to the proposition to-day and we propose to meet it and say that these men are entitled to what they have been demanding, and we shall write it in the antitrust laws. Let us review the history of that matter for a little while. When the original Sherman law was proposed in the Senate, Senator George, of Mississippi, not a demagogue, but a great lawyer and a great statesman, offered this amendment:

Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between the laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or the increasing of their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products.

The amendment was agreed to without opposition. A little later in the proceedings the bill with amendments was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and when the committee reported it back to the Senate the George amendment was left out, because all agreed that the act as written without that language in it meant exactly what was contained in the George amendment.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. Just for a question.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman contends that it never was the intention to prohibit farmers' unions, for instance, from organizing to get better prices for their products?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman contend that his proposed amendment will permit farmers' organizations to warehouse their cotton and agree among themselves that they will not sell it except at a certain price?

Mr. HENRY. Beyond the peradventure of a doubt it allows that very thing, and if it did not I would not vote for the amendment.

Mr. GARNER. There is where the gentleman differs from me with reference to the effect of his amendment.

Mr. HENRY. If it did not, I would not support it a single instant. It is as broad and strong as the George amendment and ought to be written into this law. Let us trace the history a little further. Later on, in 1900, when the Littlefield antitrust bill was before the House—and I happened to be a Member of that Congress—Mr. Terry, of Arkansas, offered an amendment which was agreed to in the House by a vote of 260 yeas to 8 nays. That amendment was offered on June 2, 1900, and is as follows:

Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to apply to trade-unions or other labor organizations, organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed.

So it was written into the antitrust bill as it passed this body and went to the Senate. After we put that exemption in the bill Mr. Littlefield lost all interest in it, and it was not heard of again in the Senate of the United States.

Next, on June 21, 1910, Mr. HUGHES, of New Jersey, offered an amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill to this effect:

Provided further, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the condition of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof not in itself unlawful.

By a vote of 82 to 52 that amendment was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, and on June 23, 1910, when the bill came back from the Senate, Mr. Tawney, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, moved to recede and concur—which meant that the House agreed to the Senate amendment—striking the Hughes exemption from the bill. That motion was agreed to by a vote of 138 to 130, and then it was that the disintegration of the standpat Republican Party began. No matter what gentlemen may say or think, when the Republican Party made it manifest that they were not willing to write this exemption in the antitrust laws the great labor organizations lost confidence in them and turned to another party. They came to the Democratic convention at Denver, and we wrote a promise in our platform. And then they came to Baltimore in 1912, and we wrote a pledge in that platform. We are here to redeem our word, just as we made it, and put the promised exemption in the antitrust legislation and send it to the Senate of the United States. [Applause.]

The amendment which has been offered by the Judiciary Committee, and has been prepared by Messrs. KITCHIN, LEWIS of Maryland, TOWNER, GRAHAM of Illinois, HINEBAUGH, and myself, in connection with them, is in the exact language of the Baltimore platform, to this effect:

The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgment of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

This language construes itself. It is the Baltimore platform in exact words. It is the spirit, the substance, the verbiage, and the promise of the Democratic platform, and Democrats will do no less than carry out their pledges to the people on this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, again, on February 26, 1913, when the sundry civil appropriation bill was under consideration, this amendment was offered by Representatives HAMILL and RODDENBERY:

Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be expended in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, the shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products or associations of farmers who cooperate or organize in the effort to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

The House agreed to that amendment, and on March 4, 1913, President Taft vetoed the bill because it contained that exemption. We passed it over his veto by the overwhelming vote of 264 yeas to 48 nays, and it went to the Senate, where the fight was waged on the question of exemption, and there in the Senate the bill failed.

Then the Democratic administration came into power, and again the Hamill-Roddenbery amendment was inserted in the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was passed through the Sixty-third Congress and signed by Woodrow Wilson. For these identical exemptions I have fought, and continue to fight. Our amendment, offered by Mr. WEBB, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is as strong, salutary, and far-reaching as the twice-approved Hamill-Roddenbery amendment.

Now, gentlemen, organized labor has never asked that they be permitted under the law to commit crimes or to do unlawful things. They have never come to this Government and pleaded for special privilege. They have never asked for anything to which they are not entitled at our hands. They have said that when we are dealing with conspiracies in restraint of trade and combinations and trusts it was never intended that the man who sells his labor—his God-given right—should be classed as conspiring against trade or in unlawful combinations against the antitrust laws. We are now about to correct that error, and make it plain and specific, by clear-cut and direct language, that the antitrust laws against conspiracies in trade shall not be applied to labor organizations and farmers' unions.

When, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, I had the honor to present the resolution bringing up for consideration this bill and the Democratic administration antitrust program, it was my privilege to announce that section 7 of this antitrust bill was not satisfactory to labor, and that I heartily concurred in that view; and that a plain provision clearly exempting them from the antitrust laws would be presented and adopted by the House. We have prepared such provision, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has presented it for us as labor and the farmers wish it. In the beginning of my remarks it is set out as approved by labor, the Committee on the Judiciary, the Democratic President, and skilled legal counsel for the wage earners. It is apparent that in a few brief moments it will be adopted by an overwhelming vote of the House. This executes the meritorious and just contract the Democratic Party has made with labor; and I rejoice that I am here to witness and participate in the triumph of the honorable men who win their bread by the sweat of their brow.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF THE PUJO MONEY TRUST COMMITTEE.

It is gratifying to state that not only has this important bill satisfied the laborer and the farmer, but it contains many other salutary and strong provisions, including some of the best recommendation of the Pujo Money Trust committee, which, as chairman of the Committee on Rules, I had the proud privilege of originating and putting on foot in the House a little over two years ago.

INTERLOCKING DIRECTORATES.

In dealing with banking corporations, interstate railways, and industrial corporations and trusts, the measure contains strong and effective provisions against interlocking directorates and all their attendant evils. It carries out the substantial provisions of the magnificent Money Trust and Steel Trust reports. Adequate penalties are provided. The plighted faith of the Democratic platform at Baltimore is kept and written into law. It makes guilt personal and consigns to prison flagrant violators of the law.

GOVERNMENT BY INJUNCTION ABOLISHED.

In several sections "government by injunction," through the usurpation of petty judicial tyrants, is destroyed and forever discontinued. No longer through the writ of injunction and the equity processes of the court can the unjust and tyrannical judge imprison and outrage honorable citizens without the right of trial by jury. The "midnight injunction" is banished and the citizen must have due and reasonable notice before he is deprived of his liberty and rights. He will have his day in court and not be outraged by secret judicial decree while his back is turned and the temples of justice shut against him. This is a great triumph for labor and justice, written in the very heart of this bill.

THE NEW FREEDOM FOR LABOR.

In section 18 a bill of rights, establishing a "new freedom" for labor, is written into solemn law to endure as a Magna Charta for those who toil and produce for the balance of mankind. I am happy to witness this day and to assist in passing this section that dedicates in our statutes a permanent command to the courts of equity and law to respect the rights of labor and cease outraging their inherent and God-given privileges. It reads:

SEC. 18. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employees, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, involving, or growing out of, a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment, unless necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property, or to a property right, of the party making the application, for which injury there is no adequate remedy at law, and such property or property right must be described with particularity in the application, which must be in writing and sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from attending at or near a house or place where any person resides or works, or carries on business or happens to be, for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or to abstain from working; or from ceasing to patronize or to employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do; or from paying or giving to, or withholding from, any person engaged in such dispute, any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value; or from peaceably assembling at any place in a lawful manner, and for lawful purposes; or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto.

Then to make sure that no court shall ever attempt to pervert and nullify the law we are going to add at the end of section 18 this broad and explicit language:

Nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held unlawful.

Is this not indeed a notable and triumphant victory for the laboring forces after their long and severe struggle for justice? My heart swells with pride when I ascribe this act of justice to the master hand of Democracy.

JURY TRIAL IN CASES OF CONSTRUCTIVE CONTEMPT.

Then follows ample provision for jury trials in cases of indirect contempt. Such is our platform promise, and thus by this strong language and act have we redeemed it. It satisfies labor and they have accepted it as a solemn redemption of our tendered pledge. What more could be asked? What more could be accomplished? In this bill labor has secured more rights and just privileges than all the legislation accorded them in a hundred years of Federal enactments! A great achievement for them and a wonderful record for Democracy!

THE STOCK-AND-BOND LAW.

The next bill coming up for consideration under the special rule is the Rayburn stock-and-bond law. This is another important recommendation of the Pujo Money Trust report. It prohibits the fraudulent and fictitious issuance of stocks and bonds by interstate railway corporations. It is patterned after and based upon the Hogg stock-and-bond law of Texas. It places these roads under the strong and dominating hand of the Government, and, wisely administered, will prevent the recurrence of the New Haven frauds and similar corrupt transactions. And so in a series of bills Democracy has come to the rescue of the people and honest men. We are doing those things we have promised the voters we would accomplish.

And having struggled through my public career for many years to bring about these reforms, I crave pardon for exulting with just pride that I have been instrumental as a member of the Rules Committee and Representative in helping to advance all these measures to the point of consummation. Let us hope that never again will special privilege be enthroned in high governmental places and the people plundered, despoiled, and robbed by those ever seeking unwarranted advantage. [Applause.]

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Minnesota consume some of his time?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK]. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment which the Committee on the Judiciary offered is amended, as proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, and it will be, and that perfected paragraph satisfies those who have contended for years for the right of organized labor to exemption from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, this is the end of one of the most notable battles in the history of our country; but if this amended paragraph does not satisfy them, then the American Congress this morning is enacting a legislative tragedy——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. I would like to get started, if the gentleman will permit me. For over a period of 10 years this particular battle, which many presume is now about to close, has been one of the chief activities here. The men who have headed the American Federation of Labor, Mr. Gompers and those associated with him, have left no stone unturned, they have worked day and night, year in and year out, to accomplish this exemption. They not only have plead with every great national convention for party platform pledges for the enactment of this exemption into law, but they have worked here in Washington in season and out of season to accomplish this. And they have accomplished upon occasion in this body within my experience political revolution. They have upset party regularity and party majority. They have overriden the veto of a President. They stood here face to face for years against the powerful National Association of Manufacturers, which attempted in every way to block the avenues to public service and to keep back this legislation. The old Republican stand-pat leadership for years had as one of its chief activities the defeat of this proposition. They locked and doubled locked this proposition in the pigeonholes of committees; but the leaders of labor who were fighting for it never repined; they never lost heart. They kept on fighting for it. Why? Because they believed in it. When this Government made the first attack upon monopoly, labor had already begun to combine itself into organization. Why? For self-preservation and for self-protection; and when labor combined in this, my friends, it soon awoke to the benefactions and blessings of cooperation.

Now, I am one of those who are sometimes designated as the gentleman from Texas says some men here are designated. For there are those who have persistently called me a demagogue because from the very start of my career I have stood for all amendments which went to the exemption of organized labor from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law. Why did I vote for them? Because I believe with all my heart and soul that the leaven that is working to the perfection of our Democracy is the aspirations and ideals of labor. [Applause.] I am in favor of giving to labor an exemption from the hindrances to progress that the courts have put upon it. Now, when we first passed the Sherman antitrust law labor believed it was exempted, and it went to the courts and the courts after long litigation told organized labor that under the terms of the Sherman antitrust law it was not exempt. That is, the courts sent organized labor back to Congress. It came here and prayed at the doors of your committees for exemption. It fought the most powerful lobby that has ever flourished in this country. It met rebuff and defeat. But it fought on and, finally, by the help of organized labor, the Democratic Party came into power. That party had given a pledge of exemption in the Baltimore platform which had been in the Democratic platform of 1908, and in response to the platform pledge the Bacon-Bartlett bills were introduced. They were direct and explicit in their terms.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. MURDOCK. I wish they had come out of the committee——

Mr. BARTLETT. Permit me to say——

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman realizes I have but a few moments——

Mr. BARTLETT. But they did come out of the committee and went on the calendar and an effort was made to get a rule from the Committee on Rules over which the gentleman from Texas presided and it could not be done.

Mr. MURDOCK. Yes; the Bacon-Bartlett bill has been smothered. Now, the Bacon-Bartlett bill was in plain, specific terms. It would have met the situation. But in place of its provisions the Democratic leadership placed upon this bill an amendment which did not exempt labor, which was unsatisfactory to a number of gentlemen on the Democratic side——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURDOCK. If the gentleman will just let me go on with this narrative—those who protested against the original amendment in this bill as it was reported out of the committee succeeded in making themselves heard, and after a discussion pro and con there was added to the original amendment the phrase which we have offered to the bill to-day in the way of an amendment by the gentleman from North Carolina. Now, what does that amendment mean?

Mr. GARNER. That is what I wanted to ask the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. What does it mean? Some of the friends of labor say that that amendment does exempt organized labor from the provisions of the Sherman antitrust law, but its enemies say that it does not exempt organized labor. Who knows? No man on the floor of this House. Who will determine? The courts.

Now, the tragedy of this transaction, my friends, is this: That after labor went to the courts and after the courts had sent it back to Congress, Congress sends labor back to the courts again. Eight or ten or twelve years hence the courts will decide what the amendment which we are about to adopt means.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. MURDOCK. No; I will not yield just now. If the gentleman will permit me, I will yield in a minute.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote for this amendment. I voted originally for the Hughes amendment—in which I believe; which was explicit. I voted for the Hamill amendment. I have voted every time this matter came up in the House for plain, direct, specific language in favor of exemption. Had I been a Member of Congress 14 years ago I should have voted for the Terry amendment. I want the House to listen again to the language of the Terry amendment. Listen:

> Nothing in this act shall be so construed as to apply to trade-unions or other labor organizations organized for the purpose of regulating wages, hours of labor, or other conditions under which labor is to be performed.

How certain that is, how direct, how sweeping, compared with the amendment which has been offered!

Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY. When the amendment says that these organizations shall not be regarded as conspiracies or illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws, how can you make it plainer?

Mr. MURDOCK. Ah, you could make it a good deal plainer.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] will offer an amendment which is direct, and which will make it plain, and will not be a subject of doubt in the courts, but will give the exemption to which labor is entitled under the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the Webb amendment, but in the time allotted to me I can not say what I desire to say on this subject, because for years I have devoted much attention to it and have frequently voted for the principle embodied in it and endeavored to have legislation of this character enacted. I did hope that I might have opportunity to speak more at length on the proposition and not simply confine myself to a synopsis of the history of this matter or to mere statement of my reasons for insisting that labor organizations and farmers' associations should not fall under the antitrust law, but I have but a few minutes. Whatever may be the result of this amendment to the antitrust bill, I claim no special credit for it, but I do insist that I have endeavored, in season and out of season, at all times, to have the injustice of the Sherman Antitrust Act, as construed by the Supreme Court, which held such associations subject to that act, corrected by proper legislation.

In the last Congress I introduced a bill which has become known as the Bartlett-Bacon bill, or the Bacon-Bartlett bill, and which was reported to this House from the Committee on Labor and went on the calendar at an early day of that Congress, and the report of the committee on that bill I hold in my hand, which is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall not be unlawful for persons employed or seeking employment to enter into any arrangements, agreements, or combinations with the view of lessening the hours of labor, or of increasing their wages, or of bettering their condition; nor shall any arrangements, agreements, or combinations be unlawful among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture when made with the view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products; and no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment in any case, or concerning any agreement, arrangement, or combination of persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture with the view of enhancing prices as aforesaid, or any act or acts done in pursuance thereof, unless in either case said injunction be necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application for which there is no adequate remedy at law; and such property or property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

In construing this act the right to enter into the relation of employer and employee, to change that relation and to assume and creat a new relation of employer and employee, and to perform and carry on business in such relation with any person in any place or do work and labor as an employee shall be held and construed to be a personal and not a property right. In all cases involving the violation of the contract of employment by either the employee or employer where no irreparable damage is about to be committed upon the property or property right of either no injunction shall be granted, but the parties shall be left to their remedy at law.

SEC. 2. That no person or persons who are employed or seeking employment or other labor shall be indicted, prosecuted, or tried in any court of the United States for entering into any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between themselves as such employees or laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or increasing their wages or bettering their condition, or for any act done in pursuance thereof, unless said act is in itself unlawful; nor shall any person or persons who may enter into any arrangements or agreements or combinations among themselves for the purpose of engaging in horticulture or agriculture with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products, be indicted, prosecuted, or tried in any court of the United States on account of making or entering into such arrangements, agreements, or combinations, or any act done in pursuance thereof, unless said act is in itself unlawful.

The purpose of this bill was to make arrangements, agreements, or combinations of wageworkers or farmers lawful, which the courts in interpreting the Sherman antitrust law have held to be illegal combinations in restraint of trade, and to restrict the injunctive power exercised by the courts over personal relations between individuals where no real property right is endangered or involved, and relegating causes in such personal relations to the adjudication of the law courts.

There has been some doubt expressed as to whether or not the Sherman antitrust law was ever intended to apply to organizations of workingmen and farmers when dealing with their own labor or the products of their own labor; but whether or not it was intended to apply to organizations of that character, the fact remains that it has been applied to them. An examination of the debates in the Senate discloses the fact that the author of the law, Senator Sherman, did not intend it to be and did not believe that it would be applied to organizations of workingmen or farmers. In the debate on the bill in the Senate on March 21 and March 24, 1890, Senators Hiscock and Teller called attention to the possibility of the measure applying to organizations of that character. Replying, Senator Sherman said:

The bill as reported contains three or four simple propositions which relate only to contracts, combinations, agreements made with a view and designed to carry out a certain purpose which the laws of all the States and of every civilized community declare to be unlawful. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with voluntary associations made to affect public opinion to advance the interests of a particular trade or occupation. It does not interfere with the Farmers' Alliance at all, because that is an association of farmers to advance their interests and to improve the growth and manner of production of their crops and to secure intelligent growth and to introduce new methods. No organizations in this country can be more beneficial in their character than farmers' alliances and farmers' associations. They are not business combinations. They do not deal with contracts, agreements, etc. They have no connection with them. And so the combinations of workingmen to promote their interests, promote their welfare, and increase their pay if you please, to get their fair share in the division of production are not affected in the slightest degree, nor can they be included in the words or intent of the bill as now reported.

Efforts were made time and time again to have that bill considered. A resolution was introduced by me, which went to the Committee on Rules, over which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] presides, asking for a rule making the bill privileged, so it could be considered. This resolution was pressed in a hearing had before that committee, and the committee was urged to give us an opportunity to have the bill considered by the House, because it was known whenever the House could have an opportunity to vote upon this measure it would pass it, having on several occasions supported a like measure in no uncertain terms and by no uncertain majorities. But we could not persuade the Committee on Rules to report the bill. Again, when this Congress met, the first bill I introduced was this same bill, a copy of which I will make a part of my remarks. The principle of my bill is now incorporated into this bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary and as contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

I congratulate the Committee on the Judiciary; I congratulate the country that the hour is now at hand when the shackles placed by a misconstruction of the Sherman antitrust law upon labor and like organizations shall be stricken from them, and when they shall stand before the country free to exercise their right to perform and do those acts as organizations that they are entitled to do and those things which no one should ever construe they were forbidden to do by the Sherman antitrust law. [Applause.]

In pursuance of that, I wish to put into the RECORD as to the right to do them the statement of that great lawyer and learned Senator, Mr. Hoar, who made it on the 27th day of March, 1890, when this original proposition was before the Senate, and when the right of Congress to pass it was challenged by other great lawyers, among them Mr. Edmunds, of Vermont. Senator Hoar then made that statement, clear and forcible, which assured the Members of the Senate that, in his opinion, we had the right to enact such legislation. It was not enacted. It was put upon the bill as an amendment, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary in the Senate, and the bill came back without it; and those same Senators, Senator George and Senator Vest, stated to the Senate that that amendment had not been incorporated because no one could construe that the Sherman antitrust law would in any way affect labor organizations.

I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 27, 1890:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment last reported.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read again.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 66, section 1, after the word "action," the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, inserted the following clause:

"Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture made with the view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish to state in one single sentence my opinion in regard to this particular provision. If I correctly understood the Senator from Vermont—I did not hear him fully, and very likely, hearing only a part of what he said, I did not apprehend it—he thought that the applying to laborers in this respect a principle which was not applied to persons engaged in the large commercial transactions which are chiefly aimed at by this bill was indefensible in principle. Now, it seems to me there is a very broad distinction which, if bourne in mind, will warrant not only this exception to the general provision of the bill, but a great deal of other legislation which we enact, or attempt to enact, relating to the matter of labor.

When you are speaking of providing to regulate the transactions of men who are making corners in wheat, or in iron, or in woolen or in cotton goods, speculating in them or lawfully dealing in them without speculation, you are aiming at a mere commercial transaction, the beginning and end of which is the making of money for the parties, and nothing else. That is the only relation that transaction has to the State. It is the creation or diffusion or change of ownership of the wealth of the community. But when a laborer is trying to raise his wages or is endeavoring to shorten the hours of his labor, he is dealing with something that touches closely, more closely than anything else, the government and the character of the State itself.

The maintenance of a certain standard of profit in dealing in large transactions on wheat or cotton or wool is a question whether a particular merchant or a particular class of merchants shall make money or not, or shall deal lawfully or not, shall affect the State injuriously or not; but the question whether the standard of the laborer's wages shall be maintained or advanced or whether the leisure for instruction, for improvement, shall be shortened or lengthened is a question which touches the very existence and character of government of the State itself. The laborer who is engaged lawfully and usefully and accomplishing his purpose in whole or in part in endeavoring to raise the standard of wages is engaged in an occupation the success of which makes republican government itself possible and without which the Republic can not in substance, however it may nominally do in form, continue to exist.

I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements, for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

It is true that in the Danbury Hat case, in Two hundred and eighth United States, the Supreme Court decided that the action of the labor union involved in that case was a violation of the Sherman antitrust law. It is also true that no longer ago than Friday last another circuit court of appeals of the United States decided in a like case that such action of a labor organization was not in violation of the Sherman antitrust law. Therefore, to make the thing clear, in order to do that which Congress has the right to do, to make the statute so clear that "he that runs may read," to make the way so plain that "the wayfaring man, though a fool, can not err therein," we propose to put the proposition in this bill in compliance with the universal demand of the labor organizations, in compliance with the Democratic platforms in 1908 and 1912, and, above all, in compliance with the demands of right and justice and civilization. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Availing myself of the privilege of extending my remarks, the Democratic national convention of 1908 declared in its platform:

The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgement of the right of wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

The Democratic national convention of 1912 also declared:

The expanding organization of industry makes it essential that there should be no abridgement of the right of the wage earners and producers to organize for the protection of wages and the improvement of labor conditions, to the end that such labor organizations and their members should not be regarded as illegal combinations in restraint of trade.

At the first session of this Congress I introduced the bill I have just referred to, which reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 1873) to make lawful certain agreements between employees and laborers, and persons engaged in agriculture or horticulture, and to limit the issuing of injunctions in certain cases, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall not be unlawful for persons employed or seeking employment to enter into any arrangements, agreements, or combinations with the view of lessening the hours of labor, or of increasing their wages, or of bettering their condition; nor shall any arrangements, agreements, or combinations be unlawful among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture when made with the view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products; and no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or by any judge thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment in any case, or concerning any agreement, arrangement, or combination of persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture with the view of enhancing prices as aforesaid, or any act or acts done in pursuance thereof, unless in either case said injunction be necessary to prevent irreparable injury to property or to a property right of the party making the application for which there is no adequate remedy at law; and such property or property right must be particularly described in the application, which must be sworn to by the applicant or by his agent or attorney.

In construing this act the right to enter into the relation of employer and employee, to change that relation and to assume and create a new relation of employer and employee and to perform and carry on business in such relation with any person in any place or do work and labor as an employee, shall be held and construed to be a personal and not a property right. In all cases involving the violation of the contract of employment by either the employee or employer where no irreparable damage is about to be committed upon the property or property right of either no injunction shall be granted, but the parties shall be left to their remedy at law.

SEC. 2. That no person or persons who are employed or seeking employment or other labor shall be indicted, prosecuted, or tried in any court of the United States for entering into any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between themselves as such employees or laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of labor or increasing their wages or bettering their condition, or for any act done in pursuance thereof, unless said act is in itself unlawful; nor shall any person or persons who may enter into any arrangements or agreements or combinations among themselves for the purpose of engaging in horticulture or agriculture with a view of enhancing the price of agricultural or horticultural products, be indicted, prosecuted, or tried in any court of the United States on account of making or entering into such arrangements, agreements, or combinations, or any act done in pursuance thereof, unless said act is in itself unlawful.

Mr. CARLIN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, to say the least of this amendment, it is as ambiguous as the prophecy of a Roman oracle. As a matter of fact it means nothing. It is a mere declaration of that which is now the law. To make the statement that this law shall not be construed so as to hold certain organizations to be illegal is simply to state that those organizations per se shall not be declared illegal by this law. You might insert a paragraph declaring that under this law the Baptist Church or the Masonic Order should not be construed to be an illegal combination in restraint of trade. They are not illegal, even, in the absence of that declaration. Agricultural organizations and labor organizations under this law are not illegal combinations, even without that declaration; and notwithstanding that declaration the very moment that an agricultural association or a laborers' organization violates any provision of this law it is applicable to such association, and they can and will be punished under the law. Any man knows that. For instance, should these associations have in their by-laws or charters articles which allowed them to form conspiracies, to form monopolies in restraint of trade, does any man contend that the very moment they attempted to carry out such declaration of the organization they would not fall under this law? To be sure they would. If you are going to exempt these organizations, exempt them. If you are not going to exempt them, say so. The amendment which I shall offer after this amendment has been voted on simply declares that the provisions of the antitrust laws shall not apply to any of these organizations. There you have a clear-cut exemption. I understood from the gentleman——

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I decline to yield to the gentleman from Texas. He twice refused to yield to me. But I will reconsider and yield to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. I thank the gentleman. I did not mean any discourtesy to him. I just did not have much time.

Mr. THOMAS. You had more time than I have. Will you have my time extended?

Mr. HENRY. I will yield next time to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS. Ask your question.

Mr. HENRY. The question is this: This amendment provides that these organizations shall not be held to be conspiracies or illegal combinations in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws. Now, what else would you allow them to do?

Mr. THOMAS. I would exempt them from the operations of this law. Notwithstanding the amendment which you are supporting, the very moment they violated any of the provisions of this law they would be punishable under the law.

Mr. HENRY. Would the gentleman allow them to commit violence under his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS. No, sir; they would not be allowed to commit violence under my amendment, because there are laws in this country to punish any man who commits violence or who destroys property. There are laws outside of the antitrust laws for the punishment of crime.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. HENRY. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes on each side, five minutes to be given to that side and five minutes to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the time be extended 10 minutes, 5 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and five minutes by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. VOLSTEAD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that has the approval of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CARLIN. I have no objection. We are glad to accommodate our friends.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Virginia yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. CARLIN. Yes; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I shall offer after the committee amendment has been voted on is simply to the effect that the provisions of this law shall not apply to these organizations. Mr. Chairman, there are some Members of this House who want to talk all the time and do not want anybody else to talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. THOMAS. As I had started to state, I believe when we go a-catting we ought to go a-catting; and I believe that if we are going to take these organizations out from under this law we ought to do it in such a way that there can be no mistake about it and no reason for any court decisions upon the question hereafter. [Applause.] My amendment simply says that these antitrust laws shall not apply to these organizations. If any man thinks he can make an amendment plainer than that, I would like to hear from that gentleman, even the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Now, these organizations ought to be exempt. These antitrust laws are intended for the suppression of monopolies and trusts. Who ever heard of an agricultural trust? Who ever heard of a laborers' trust? They are not the men who have the wealth of this country. Yet under these antitrust laws as they have been construed by the courts if a number of farmers pool their tobacco or their wool or any other agricultural product and employ an agent to sell it for them in order to get the best obtainable prices they commit an act for which they are subject to punishment under these antitrust laws, as the tobacco farmers of the State of Kentucky were. You have heard of that case. A number of farmers pooled their tobacco. One of them went out of the pool, took his tobacco to the depot, and got a bill of lading for it to Cincinnati. His neighbors met and sent a committee to him and asked him to stand with them and not ship his tobacco to Cincinnati. He said, "Well, he had had the trouble of hauling it to the depot, and that it was all right if they would haul it back." They hauled it back. For their action they were indicted and fined $3,500. President Taft finally pardoned them of the fine, but he never would do it until the prosecution of the Beef Trust under these antitrust laws failed in Chicago. So I say, gentlemen, that if you are going to take them out of the provisions of these laws, take them out. If you are going to keep them in, why, keep them in, and do not go to beating the devil around the bush about it. Come out plainly and let us keep them in or take them out, one of the two. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] tells you that when the Sherman law was passed it was intended to exempt farmers' and laborers' organizations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the principle of exempting these organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws. I expect to vote for the Webb amendment, if for no other reason, for the moral effect that the adoption of that amendment will have; but I am not given to self-deception, and in voting for that amendment I am not deceiving myself as to the effect of that amendment. That amendment may have some beneficial effect for the organizations mentioned therein, but it will not exempt those organizations from the operation of the antitrust laws. Now, the Supreme Court in the case of Loewe against Lawlor, commonly known as the Danbury Hat case, put this matter up to Congress in no uncertain terms. They say, on page 279 of volume 208 of the United States Reports:

> After the Sherman law was enacted bills were introduced in the Fifty-second Congress—

And then they enumerate all the bills that have been introduced to amend the Sherman antitrust law, making it inapplicable to labor and these other organizations. And then they say:

> Congress therefore has refused to exempt labor unions from the comprehensive provisions of the Sherman law against combinations in restraint of trade, and this refusal is the more significant, as it followed the recognition by the courts that the Sherman antitrust law applied to labor organizations.

Now, the amendment that has been offered by the gentleman from North Carolina makes by implication these organizations subject to the terms of the law. It defines certain acts which are said in general terms to be permissible, and therefore by implication it leaves forbidden other acts which are not permissible, and makes by implication these organizations subject expressly to the terms of the Sherman law if they should violate any of the provisions of the law.

Another point is this: The amendment provides that they shall be liable only within certain limits and those limits are confined to this—where they exercise their powers only for mutual help and not for profit. They are limited absolutely to that field in their operations, and who, forsooth, will decide whether their operations fall within the restrictions of mutual help and not for profit? Why, the courts, of course; and you will have the same old battle for definite construction over and over again. Therefore you have for certain purposes and as to certain acts brought these organizations where the courts may hold them expressly within the operation of the Sherman law.

Now, every gentleman who gives this matter any consideration instinctively realizes that this is true. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] realizes it as well as anybody else, because in his speech this morning he said, "Gentlemen, we are going to make this law not to apply to these organizations." He said in this speech "not apply"; why does he not say so in the amendment? There is no way of making it any plainer or simpler or doing what you want to do than to use the language that the gentleman used in his speech, but which is not used in the amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. And are not the words "shall not apply" the words used in the Terry amendment, in the Hamill amendment, and in the Hughes amendment?

Mr. MACDONALD. Yes; every amendment proposed to this law have used the words, and that was in the amendment that the Supreme Court in the Danbury Hat case said if Congress had done those things there would be no question about the operation of the law. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KONOP].

Mr. KONOP. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment exempting labor, farm, and other like organizations from the operations of antitrust laws. Section 7 of this bill, which provides that the existence and operations of such organizations shall be construed not to be forbidden, means very little and provides no exemption whatever. I am in favor of exempting these organizations because in this bill we are not dealing with associations of men, but associations of dollars for profit. We are aiming at the gigantic trusts and combinations of capital and not at associations of men for the betterment of their condition. We are aiming at the dollars and not at men. We do aim to put an end to association of men's dollars which unlawfully restrain trade, destroy competition, and create monopoly. Let us put the man above the dollar and exempt all associations of men organized for the betterment of their condition. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, we are a great country. We have been blessed with wonderful natural resources. We have a great Government. We have great farms and great industries. And what is it that makes our country so great? Not the idler, not the men who sit amidst downy bolsters and costly appliances, but the men who work with hand and brain. These are the men who contribute to our country's greatness. These are the men who produce the wealth of this country. It is true that both capital and labor are essential in our industrial progress, both are entitled to consideration, but the men who labor are entitled to higher consideration, because they are the producers of all wealth and capital. The men who labor in the field and factory are the men who make our country great.

The almighty dollar needs no protector. The idle rich, whose money is invested in great, oppressive trusts and combinations, have always been able to take care of themselves and then yet some. But the laboring man has struggled through the ages for emancipation. The struggle is still on. Slavery, peonage, feudalism, and oppression of every kind has been the lot of the producers of wealth. But a new era has come. Labor is now organized. The farmers are now organized. And because of these organizations much has been done to elevate the toiler to a higher plane. Much is being done toward a complete emancipation of the man who works. Better, sanitary, and safer places and conditions are provided for labor to work. The hours of labor are being shortened and a better living wage is being paid, not because of the philanthropy of capital, but because through organization labor is able to obtain these reforms. Where would parcels post be had it not been for the organized demand of the farmers of the country? What we should do is not to hamper these great organizations of laborers and farmers of the land, but to encourage them in the conservation of the health and welfare of the great masses. [Applause.]

Some say that this amendment is class legislation, and hence unconstitutional. Mr. Chairman, way back in March 25, 1890, nearly a quarter of a century ago, when the Sherman antitrust bill was under consideration in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, Senator Sherman offered an amendment to the bill, as follows:

> Provided, That this act shall not be construed to apply to any arrangements, agreements, or combinations between laborers, made with a view of lessening the number of hours of their labor or of increasing their wages; nor to any arrangements, agreements, associations, or combinations among persons engaged in horticulture or agriculture, made with a view of enhancing the price of their own agricultural or horticultural products.

This amendment was adopted on that day. On March 27, when the bill was before the Senate, some discussion arose as to the constitutionality of the amendment, and Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, used these words, in which I entirely concur:

> I hold, therefore, that as legislators we may constitutionally, properly, and wisely allow laborers to make associations, combinations, contracts, agreements for the sake of maintaining and advancing their wages, in regard to which, as a rule, their contracts are to be made with large corporations who are themselves but an association or combination or aggregation of capital on the other side. When we are permitting and even encouraging that we are permitting and encouraging what is not only lawful, wise, and profitable, but absolutely essential to the existence of the Commonwealth itself.

When, on the other hand, we are dealing with one of the other classes, the combinations aimed at chiefly by this bill, we are dealing with a transaction the only purpose of which is to extort from the community, monopolize, segregate, and apply to individual use, for the purposes of individual greed, wealth which ought properly and lawfully and for the public interest to be generally diffused over the whole community.

Mr. Chairman, the Sherman antitrust law was passed in 1890. It was aimed at trusts and combinations of capital; and in spite of that law the trusts and combinations have grown. Its author at that time hoped that it would solve the trust problem, but the trusts and combines grew with impunity, and we are to-day hoping that we have a cure for the trust evils. I shall vote for these three trust bills because I believe it is a step in the right direction. My only hope and wish is that the trust evil can be curbed. But in the discussion of the different sections of these bills we hear that we can not go further than interstate commerce goes in curbing these great combinations. I think the trust problem could better be handled if constitutionally we had power to regulate all commerce, and I think the time will come when an amendment to the Constitution of the United States giving Congress power to regulate commerce, intrastate as well as interstate, will be given serious consideration.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in conclusion, I hope that the amendment exempting these organizations will prevail. Let us give encouragement to the toilers and farmers of the land. These men are the very bulwarks of our prosperity and greatness.

Mr. CARLIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I understand they are about to slip a little amendment in here that the courts and the country can easily handle. Now, I want to put something in that has guts in it. This amendment talks about the courts "construing" and "holding." My friend from Texas talks about what Gen. George did. I have the honor to come from the same State that James G. George came from. If Senator George were here, he would be an advocate for this amendment. He was recognized as one of the greatest lawyers in the whole Union, and if he were living to-day he would throw up his hands in holy horror at the forward steps taken by the Federal courts of this country. In his day, gentlemen, the courts did not undertake to legislate away the rights of the people; but now it has come to the point that the people can not get their rights except through Congress, and when we come here some Members want to put a little easy stuff in that the courts can construe against the farmers' unions and the labor unions. Let us put language in here that they can not misconstrue; let us put in language that nothing in this antitrust law shall apply to farmers' unions and labor unions. We know that these organizations and farmers' unions are not any criminal trusts. The great trusts and monopolies of this country that with greedy hands grind profits out of human blood want such measly language as you are proposing to put into this antitrust law. They do not want the strong, virile language, the Anglo-Saxon words that every schoolboy, much less a Supreme Court judge, will understand; and for that reason I hope that the House will adopt the Thomas amendment into this antitrust law. [Applause.]

The great and powerful influence of monopolistic corporations has been growing and overriding the United States Congress and the courts. Many on this floor claim that the Sherman law is good enough. If that law is good enough, I ask in the name of the people why it is that ever since this law has been on the statute books the trusts and monopolies have organized, grown, multiplied, and prospered to such an extent that the people have been robbed and the courts of the country openly defied? If the Sherman antitrust law is good enough, there is something radically wrong with the Federal courts and the Federal district attorneys. I am induced to believe that there is something the matter with both. The Republican Party never did want to enforce the law against big money.

Virtually all of the Federal judges and the United States district attorneys are the appointees of the Republican Presidents. Some of them try to enforce all the law.

Where these district judges and attorneys endeavored to put the big criminals, the head men in these gigantic trusts, behind the bars, these conscientious officials have been handicapped in every possible manner. Many judges have endeavored to enforce the Sherman antitrust law, but have you heard of one of these trust nabobs being sent to the penitentiary? The only effective way that it has been enforced is against the poor people. It has never yet hurt a rich man. The poor men who compose farmers' unions and labor unions have felt the heavy hand of the Sherman antitrust law.

My friend from Texas [Mr. HENRY] says Senator George never thought the law would apply to such beneficent organizations. The whole record shows that the great lawyers of that Congress never dreamed of such an outrage as the Sherman antitrust law being construed by the courts so as to affect the farmers and labor organizations of this country. The only way on earth to keep the eagle eye of the Federal courts off the farmers' unions and the labor unions is to make this antitrust law so plain that they are not included in its scope that any child in the United States can understand it. If there is the slightest ambiguity in the language, you will hear of some Federal judge in "Possum Hollow" announcing a decision that the farmers' union is a trust in restraint of trade and that the individual members are subject to indictment if by concert of action they hold their cotton or other farm products for a higher price. I am going to vote for the Webb amendment, and on top of that I shall support the Thomas amendment. The Webb amendment leaves too much for the courts to construe; but if you will follow it up by adopting the Thomas amendment, we all know the farmers' unions and the labor organizations will be in the "clear" for all time.

The great capitalists of the United States have been busy for many years organizing powerful trusts, and, as an incident to their business, they have oppressed labor, destroyed honest competitors, robbed and plundered the people. Their activities have not been confined to any special lines, but these financial freebooters have operated in every nook and corner of every field of all commerce. Every household necessity is now under the control of some trust. They did not even think enough of the poor to let meat remain free from their greedy, monopolistic hands. Can any man in this House think of an organization of thieves equal to that gigantic aggregation of capitalists who form the Beef Trust? Why is it that none of these men are wearing stripes in the penitentiary? It is either the fault of the law or it is the fault of the Federal judges and district attorneys where they operate. I believe this bill we are passing now will be so plain that no judge can construe it so as to release the trust magnates.
